PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS
THIRD SESSION.

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, as we meet to-day to represent this mighty Nation the shadow of a great loss falls upon us. One of the men of might, a leader of men, a patriot and scholar has passed from us. He was honored by his countrymen in being called to preside, as Vice President, over this body, and then called to be our Chief Executive. His name has added luster to the history of our country, and his achievements have increased our influence in the life of the world.

Throughout the Nation there goes a sense of sorrow that this strong man, so brave and chivalrous and true, has come to the end of his great career. We pray Thy blessing upon his devoted wife and children as they mourn his loss. We pray Thy blessing upon the country he loved so well, that in this hour of great responsibility we may measure up to the dignity and importance of our task. Still raise up among us men who in mind and spirit will embody our highest ideals and perpetuate the institutions that have been erected for us by our national heroes.

In our communion of sorrow to-day may we learn that unity of action and ideal that will make us more and more an evangel of good will to men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM RHODE ISLAND.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the credentials of Hon. LEBARON BRADFORD COLT, which will be read and placed on the file.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 5th day of November, 1918, LEBARON BRADFORD COLT was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1919.

Witness: His Excellency our governor, R. Livingston Beeckman, and our seal hereto affixed at Providence, this 28th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1918.

R. LIVINGSTON BEECKMAN, Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL.] J. FRED PARKER, Secretary of State.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE (H. DOC. NO. 1642).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed report of expenditures of all moneys appropriated under the act providing for the national security and defense for stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products during the period from August 10, 1917, to June 30, 1918, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

EVASION OF MILITARY SERVICE (S. DOC. NO. 322).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 6, 1918, certain information furnished by the Bureau of Naturalization, Department of Labor, relative to the number of affidavit forms received by the bureau and executed under the provisions of the selective-draft act, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EMPLOYEES IN DEPARTMENT OF STATE (S. DOC. NO. 326).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees in the department January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EMPLOYEES IN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE (S. DOC. NO. 324).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees in the department January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EMPLOYEES IN DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE (S. DOC. NO. 325).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees in the department January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EMPLOYEES OF FUEL ADMINISTRATION (S. DOC. NO. 323).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the United States Fuel Administrator, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees in the Fuel Administration January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the petition of Henry Ford, of Dearborn, Mich., asking that the Senate shall take steps to preserve and recount the ballots cast at the senatorial election recently held in that State. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PETITION OF HENRY FORD AND NOTICE OF CONTEST.

To the Senate of the United States of America:

I, Henry Ford, of Dearborn, Mich., the petitioner, do hereby give notice of my intention to contest, and do hereby enter and file a contest of the election of Mr. Truman H. Newberry as Senator from Michigan to succeed the Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH; and I request and petition for a recount of the ballots cast at the election held in Michigan November 5, 1918, and an investigation of the unlawful uses by said Truman H. Newberry and, in his behalf, by his agents and representatives of large sums of money to influence the primary and election, and also of cases of undue influence and intimidation of voters at the election.

I beg to represent to your honorable body:

(1) That an election was held by the voters of Michigan on the 5th day of November, 1918, to elect a United States Senator from Michigan for the term beginning March 4, 1919. That Truman H. Newberry was the candidate on the Republican ticket, Henry Ford on the Democratic ticket, Edward O. Foss on the Socialist ticket, and William J. Faull on the Prohibition ticket.

(2) That the official canvass made by the State canvassing board showed 220,054 votes cast for said Newberry, 212,487 votes cast for said Henry Ford, 4,763 votes cast for said Foss, and 1,133 votes cast for said Faull, and that in pursuance of such canvass said board announced the result of the election to be that the above-mentioned number of votes were cast for each of the said candidates as stated above.

(3) That a certificate of election as such Senator has heretofore been issued to said Truman H. Newberry, and he claims to have been duly elected such Senator, and he has heretofore caused his credentials as such to be offered to the United States Senate, namely, on or about the 14th day of December, 1918.

(4) That the primary election to select candidates by the respective parties for such United States Senator was held on August 27, 1918; that in the primaries Mr. Truman H. Newberry was a candidate for the Republican nomination; your petitioner was candidate for the Republican nomination, also for the Democratic nomination, and he was nominated on the Democratic ticket and said Truman H. Newberry was nominated on the Republican ticket; that large sums of money were unlawfully used and expended by and on behalf of said Newberry at said primary election and previous thereto to effect such election and to bring about his nomination and to purchase and procure the support and efforts of divers large numbers of persons and newspapers and periodicals. It was admitted by the committee, composed of a large number of men who acted in behalf of the nomination of Mr. Newberry, that said committee expended $176,568.08, and a sworn report to that effect was made under the State law by Mr. Frank W. Blair, the treasurer of said committee, and said report was filed with the county clerk of Wayne County, Mich., where said Blair resided. And petitioner states upon information and belief that it can and will be proved that said Truman H. Newberry procured the appointment and selection of said committee and its members and was directly responsible for all its acts, and that he was in constant communication with said committee and its members and knew of and approved its large expenditures of moneys and participated in its work. Upon information and belief petitioner says that large sums of money, aggregating many thousands of dollars, were expended by or on behalf of said Newberry's nomination, entirely outside of said $176,568.08 above mentioned, as having been admitted in the hiring of workers and other illegitimate expenses, and contrary to the laws of the United States and of the State of Michigan in that behalf. That a memorial with respect to the above matters was filed with the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in the month of November last by Mr. Elbert H. Fowler, a lawyer and reputable citizens of the city of Detroit, Mich., who had acted as secretary of the Nonpartisan Ford-for-Senator Club in connection with the election, a copy of which memorial or statement is hereto attached and made a part hereof, and upon information and belief petitioner avers the statements thereof to be true.

(5) He further shows that the large sums of money expended by and in behalf of the nomination of Mr. Truman H. Newberry as hereinbefore stated unlawfully enlisted the aid and support of large numbers of persons, papers, and periodicals throughout the State, and the results and influence of which extended down to and affected the election materially in favor of the said Truman H. Newberry and that said great sums of money were expended in violation of the statutes of the United States and of the State of Michigan in such cases provided.

(6) The petitioner shows on information and belief that said Truman H. Newberry was not truly or lawfully elected to said office of United States Senator and is not entitled to said office and that your petitioner was elected and is entitled to said seat, and he specifies:

(a) That there are about 2,200 election precincts or districts in Michigan and that nearly all of the election boards were composed wholly of Republicans and great numbers of them were wholly composed of intense partisans of Mr. Newberry, and that only in a comparatively few of them were there at the said election any challengers or others acting in behalf of the Democratic candidates and that every opportunity existed for election officials who were so inclined to miscount the ballots in favor of Mr. Newberry.

(b) That a large number of ballots were unlawfully counted for said Newberry, which, in fact and in truth, were cast for Henry Ford, namely, at least 10,000.

(c) That large numbers of ballots lawfully cast for petitioner were not counted for him, but were unlawfully rejected by the various precinct election boards when making the counts, and they were not returned for petitioner as in truth they ought to have been, namely, at least 10,000.

(d) That in many election precincts or districts the count by the election officers and boards was illegal, in favor of Newberry, false and fraudulent, and in violation of the election laws governing the count.

(e) Many of the ballots marked and cast for petitioner were counted and returned for the said Truman H. Newberry.

(f) In many precincts, particularly in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, the provisions of law enacted to protect the sanctity and secrecy of the ballots and to promote a true and honest vote and count were flagrantly violated and many important and vital irregularities and departures from such provision occurred, thus vitiating under the law the vote of such precincts. As, for instance, the marking of ballots for voters by authorized third person, the exposure of ballots by the voters, the overseeing of the voting by mine bosses and superintendents, and the like; all of which were conducted in the interests of said Truman H. Newberry, and the votes of such precincts should be rejected and thrown out.

(g) That many ballots in many precincts duly marked and cast for petitioner were rejected by the respective election boards and not counted at all.

(h) That many ballots bearing unlawful distinguishing marks were illegally and unlawfully counted for the said Truman H. Newberry.

(i) Many ballots duly marked and cast for your petitioner were wholly rejected and thrown out by many election boards on the unlawful and fraudulent pretext that they were not duly and properly marked for the petitioner, whereas, in fact, they were so marked and cast.

(j) Many ballots duly and properly marked and cast for the petitioner were rejected and thrown out by many election boards on the unlawful and fraudulent pretext that they bore distinguishing marks, whereas, in fact, they did not bear any unlawful distinguishing marks and ought to have been counted for your petitioner.

(k) Many ballots duly and lawfully marked and cast for petitioner were erroneously thrown out and not counted for petitioner by many of the said election boards under erroneous interpretations of their duties.

(l) Many ballots for said Truman H. Newberry were corruptly and unlawfully procured to be cast and counted for him by the unlawful use of money in his behalf.

(m) Large sums of money were unlawfully expended by and in behalf of said Truman H. Newberry to influence said election and cause votes to be cast for him that otherwise would not have been so cast.

(n) Large numbers of lawful voters were intimidated and prevented from voting at the said election by partisans and supporters of said Newberry who otherwise would have voted at the election and cast their votes for the petitioner, to wit, 5,000 of such voters.

(o) Large numbers of lawful voters, employees of certain large corporations, were intimidated and unlawfully coerced by employers and their representatives into voting for said Newberry against their wills and preferences who otherwise would have cast their ballots for the petitioner.

(p) In a number of the counties the respective boards of county canvassers made and reported their canvasses without having or examining the poll books and tally sheets nor in any way verifying the number of original votes as cast or the numbers of voters voting at the respective precincts.

(q) That careful investigation by petitioner's directions have been made by reliable men since the election to ascertain as far as may be the detailed facts pertaining to the above statements and as to the conduct of counting in said election, and from such investigations and from other information reaching the petitioner and his representatives, he avers the foregoing statements to be true, and he particularly specifies the following counties and election districts as the counties and districts where such irregularities, miscounting, and frauds were more flagrantly committed, namely: Kent, Bay, Kalamazoo, Wayne, Saginaw, Allegan, Antrim, Baraga, Barry, Benzie, Berrien, Calhoun, Cass, Charlevoix, Chippewa, Clare, Dickinson, Eaton, Emmet, Genesee, Gladwin, Gogebic, Gratiot, Hillsdale, Houghton, Huron, Ingham, Ionia, Iosco, Iron, Isabella, Jackson, Kalkaska, Keweenaw, Lapeer, Lenawee, Macomb, Marquette, Mason, Mecosta, Midland, Monroe, Montcalm, Montmorency, Muskegon, Newaygo, Oakland, Oceana, Osceola, Ottawa, Sanilac, St. Clair, St. Joseph, Tuscola, Van Buren, Washtenaw, Wexford; and that such irregularities and miscounts occurred in a more modified degree in nearly all the other counties of the State, and that mistakes unfavorable to petitioner and in favor of the said Truman H. Newberry occurred in all of the counties.

(r) That upon a fair and lawful recount of the ballots cast at said election, your petitioner would be decided to be duly and lawfully elected Senator from Michigan.

(s) That upon such a fair and lawful recount and due allowances being made for such frauds, intimidations, and prevention of votes, petitioner would be decided and declared by your honorable body to have been duly and lawfully elected Senator from Michigan.

(7) Your petitioner shows that the ballots cast at said election were under the laws of Michigan replaced in the several ballot boxes which were then locked and sealed and the ballot boxes delivered to the respective officers under the laws of Michigan, and they are now in the custody of the said several officers, as provided by law.

(8) That the law carefully specifies and directs that said ballots shall be preserved and guarded, as stated, but does not specify the length of time they shall be thus preserved, and petitioner shows that under the uniform practice prevailing in Michigan for many years past such ballots will be preserved only until the next election, when they will be removed from the ballot boxes and destroyed or lost; that the next general election will be held in Michigan on the first Monday in April, 1919, and that the primaries therefor will be held in large numbers of the various precincts at various dates during the month of March, and that at such times following said customs the said ballot boxes will be opened and the ballots removed therefrom and either wholly destroyed or lost.

(9) Petitioner further shows that following the debate in your honorable body on December 14, 1918, as to receiving the credentials of Mr. Truman H. Newberry and referring the same to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in which it was affirmed, on the one hand, that the ballots would be destroyed before the April election, and, on the other hand, that they would not be destroyed, a very significant and suggestive article appeared in the Detroit Free Press, namely, on December 20, 1918; that the Detroit Free Press is a daily newspaper of large circulation throughout the State of Michigan and has been a violent advocate of the election of Mr. Newberry; that it had editorially and in news articles repeatedly attempted to justify the vast expenditures of money for and on behalf of Mr. Newberry, and has viciously and continuously assailed any and all attempts to investigate the same, and has constantly attacked the motives of all officials who have attempted to investigate or bring to justice those concerned with violations of the laws; and, in fact, said Free Press is known generally as the organ in said primaries and election campaigns of the said Newberry and his committee and advocates aforesaid. That said suggestive article so published on December 20, 1918, was as follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press, Friday, Dec. 20, 1918.]

MIGHT DESTROY FORD BALLOTS—DISTRICT CLERKS TO BE ASKED TO KEEP SENATORIAL VOTES—RECOUNT MAY BE HAMPERED BY LACK IN MICHIGAN STATUTE.

Discovery of a striking omission in the Michigan election laws is the result of speculation over the possibilities of a recount or inspection of ballots in the Newberry-Ford case, now regarded as certain to come up in the United States Senate after March 4.

It appears that nowhere in the Michigan law is there provision for the preservation of ballots after the legal time for recounts has passed, and it also develops that there is no occasion for saving them except in case of presidential, United States Representative, or United States senatorial elections.

MIGHT DESTROY BALLOTS.

Therefore the present situation is such that if the United States Senate should decide to recount the Ford-Newberry ballots, county and city clerks anywhere in Michigan may have destroyed them long before the new Senate, which convenes March 4, 1919, could decide upon a recount. Moreover, the April election follows closely after that date, and it would be altogether probable that a recount would not be under way much before the next spring election.

Efforts will be made to remedy the situation at once. The legislature will meet January 1, and a bill amending the election law, or constituting a new statute, to cover the case will be ready for presentation on that date. If the bill is passed without delay and is given immediate effect it would be law before the April elections.

WILL ASK DELAY.

A request from interested persons to county clerks to refrain from destroying the ballots will be forwarded within a few days, in the hope that if a recount eventually comes about there will be no question of missing ballots. As the law stands now the ballots may be destroyed, as the legal time for recounts on State offices has passed and there is nothing before any court to operate to hold up the usual course of events.

Petitioner submits this article, coming from such source, was manifestly designed and intended to convey to the custodians of the ballots that it was not unlawful and that it was perfectly safe to destroy or lose the ballots, and such was the very general interpretation placed upon the article.

Accordingly, in order to preserve, if possible, the ballots until your honorable body should take some action to preserve and recount the ballots, petitioner caused to be filed bills in equity in the eastern and western districts of Michigan. On the filing of said bills a temporary restraining order for 10 days was granted ex parte, and an order to show cause why temporary injunction should not be granted. Said 10 days in the western district will expire January 7, 1919, and in the eastern district on January 9, 1919.

(10) And the petitioner further shows that he is advised that under the laws of Michigan there is no body or tribunal which has control of a recount except the United States Senate, and that his only adequate relief to preserve and recount the ballots lies in suitable action to that end by your honorable body.

(11) That petitioner has caused notice of his intention to contest the alleged election of said Truman H. Newberry to the United States Senate to be duly served upon the said Truman H. Newberry, viz, on the 2d day of January, 1919.

(12) The petitioner hereby prays and requests the Senate to entertain his said contest; to provide for a recount of the said ballots and the due preservation of said ballots for the purpose of the recount and of evidence in the contest, and for a prompt investigation of said election and primary and of the matters hereinbefore set forth; and that said Truman H. Newberry be declared not elected, and also disqualified and not entitled to a seat, because of the aforesaid violations of law, and that petitioner may be declared elected and entitled to said seat, and that he may have such further action of the Senate and its duly appointed committees and agents and such other relief as shall be conformable to justice and as the premises shall warrant; and he will ever petition, etc.

HENRY FORD.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
County of Wayne, ss:

Henry Ford, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has read the foregoing petition and notice, and that the same is true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

HENRY FORD.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 2d day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.] ERNEST KANZLER,
Notary Public, Wayne County, Mich.

My commission expires October 12, 1919.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
County of Wayne, ss:

Robert E. Walter being duly sworn deposes and says that he is a citizen of Michigan and a resident of the county of Wayne, Mich.; that he has read the foregoing petition and notice of contest and knows the contents thereof; and that paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, and 10 are true; and deponent further says that he was a member of the Legislature of Michigan, viz, a senator, for three successive terms, namely, from 1911 to 1917; and that he was one of a committee of three members of the legislature who conducted a recount of the votes cast in the twenty-second senatorial district, comprising the whole of the county of Saginaw (which is one of the three or four largest counties in Michigan) in the year 1913. He further says that since the election of November 5, 1918, he has devoted nearly all his time to the investigation of the said election in the various parts of the State, and that he has traveled, personally, to various parts of the State in that work and has received reports from a considerable number of other careful and reliable men who have devoted their time to the said work of investigation, and that every precaution has been taken to make such investigation thorough, reliable, and strictly according to the truth. And he further says that from such experiences above described and from his said investigations and the said reports he states that he has good reasons to believe, and does believe, that the allegations of the fourth, sixth, and ninth paragraphs of said petition and notice of contest are true. And he further says that the representatives of Mr. Ford have now a great abundance of evidence to establish Mr. Truman H. Newberry's personal connection with his said campaign committee, described in the foregoing petition and notice, and with the activities of said committee in his behalf, and that said campaign was conducted with his full knowledge, consent, and active cooperation. And he further says that said Ford's representatives have reliable proofs of large numbers of unlawful expenditures of moneys in said Truman H. Newberry's campaign, involving large amounts in a great many portions of the State not set out or included in said report of Frank W. Blair, treasurer of said committee; and the said contestant's representatives are ready to produce such proofs and the witnesses to sustain the charges in the petition, but deponent deems it advisable and safest not to give the names of said additional witnesses for very obvious reasons.

He further says that contestant's representatives have reliable evidence of great activities on the part of the supporters of Mr. Newberry and his committee to suppress the evidence of said unlawful expenditures and of attempts to prevent disclosure by those having knowledge of the facts, and these proofs contestant's representatives are prepared to present to any committee authorized by the Senate to investigate the election.

That the ballot boxes used at elections in Michigan are very generally of a very solid, well-made construction, and of a permanent character.

ROBERT E. WALTER.

The undersigned, Woodbridge N. Ferris, being duly sworn, upon his oath says that he is now and has been for more than 34 years last passed a resident of Big Rapids, in the county and State aforesaid, where he conducts the Ferris Institute, and that during the years 1913 to 1916, inclusive, he was governor of the State of Michigan.

Affiant further says that for approximately 34 years last passed he has been acquainted with the universal and prevailing custom with reference to the preservation of ballots in his own and neighboring counties in the State of Michigan.

Affiant says that said prevailing custom and practice as uniformly observed in his section of Michigan will result in the ballots cast at the general election held in Michigan November 5, 1918, being taken from the ballot boxes and destroyed at the time of the next general election to be held in said State on April 7, 1919, and in some localities where local elections are held prior thereto said ballots will be destroyed at the time of said local elections.

Affiant is informed and believes that this custom has uniformly prevailed for years throughout the State of Michigan.

The undersigned, John W. Bailey, being duly sworn, upon his oath says that he is now and has been for more than 50 years last passed a resident of Battle Creek, in the county and State aforesaid.

Affiant states that he has been mayor of Battle Creek and that at the last general election in Michigan he was a candidate for governor on the Democratic ticket.

Affiant says further that he has for approximately 28 years been acquainted with the custom with reference to the preservation of ballots in his own and neighboring counties.

Affiant says that said prevailing custom and practice as uniformly observed in his section of the State would result in the ballots cast at the last general election held in Michigan on November 5, 1918, being taken from said ballot boxes and destroyed at the time of the next general election to be held in the State of Michigan on April 7, 1919, if they had not been removed and destroyed because of some local election or elections held prior thereto.

Affiant is informed and believes that this custom has uniformly prevailed for years throughout the State of Michigan.

The undersigned, Peter J. Danhof, being duly sworn, says that he is now and has been for more than 30 years last past a resident of Ottawa and Kent Counties, in said State, and that he is engaged in the practice of law.

Affiant further states that he is familiar with the provisions of law of this State relative to the preservation of ballots cast in elections in said State and the disposition of said ballots.

Affiant further says that in accordance with said provisions of law he verily believes that the ballots cast at the general election held in said counties of Ottawa and Kent on November 5, 1918, will be taken and removed from said ballot boxes and destroyed before or at the time of the next general election, to be held in this State on April 7, 1919, and in some localities where local elections are held prior thereto, he believes the said ballots will be removed from the ballot boxes and destroyed before or at the time of said local elections.

Affiant further says that he is informed and verily believes the same to be true that the said practice of removing the ballots from the ballot boxes and destroying the same has become a uniform custom which prevailed for years throughout the State of Michigan.

Chairman Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I am a Republican who was inclined to support Mr. Truman Newberry for Senator in the Michigan primary election until I personally saw evidence of the extravagant use of large sums of money, in what I felt to be unlawful amounts, to advance his candidacy. I then decided I could not support him in the primaries. Some weeks after the primaries I joined the Nonpartisan Ford-for-Senator Club, an organization composed largely of prominent Republicans, who looked with disfavor upon the method used by Mr. Newberry and his committee to obtain the Republican nomination. I acted as secretary of this organization. Our membership was over 20,000 before the election of November 5.

As secretary of this organization I was in constant communication with prominent Republicans throughout the State of Michigan who saw the lavish expenditure of the Newberry committee and protested against them. From them and in other ways I have collected a large amount of information and reports, sufficient, I think, to convince your committee that an investigation of the campaign is necessary, and ample, I hope, to form the basis for a complete investigation of the campaign.

It would seem that an investigation is absolutely necessary. In the words of Senator KENYON (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1918, p. 10395), "If this enormous expenditure of money in senatorial campaigns is to go on without any challenge by Congress, then the poor man has no chance ever to secure a seat in this body and simply the rich can purchase a seat here."

There should be no objection to an investigation at this time. I feel that Senator TOWNSEND expressed the sentiment admirably when he said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1918, p. 10393): "I would be glad to have a full and complete investigation, and if Mr. Newberry shall receive a certificate of election in November, and charges are preferred against his title, I will not only vote to investigate, but I will vote to unseat him if corruption which secured his nomination is proven."

The information to form the basis of an investigation is sent you under separate cover.

Yours, very truly, ELBERT H. FOWLER.

In the matter of Michigan primary senatorial election of 1918, Detroit, Mich.

To the COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIRS: The following statement of evidence pertaining to the Newberry senatorial compaign is sent you in compliance with my telegram of November 14 and letter of November 15, 1918, and it is hoped that it will be of assistance to you as a basis for the proposed investigation:

The United States statute governing the matter is contained in First United States Compiled Statutes of 1916, pages 65 to 72, section 198, page 72, providing:

"Every person willfully violating any of the foregoing provisions shall upon conviction be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisonment not more than one year, or both."

Section 195 defines who shall be considered a candidate, which clearly includes a candidate for the nomination or election to the office of United States Senator. Subdivision 3 of section 195, which is printed on page 169, states that the candidate shall file with the Secretary of the Senate "a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent from any source in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part, and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom money and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election."

Subdivision 4 also contains the requirement for a similar statement to be filed within 15 days after the primary. Subdivision 7, printed on pages 70 and 71, provides:

"No candidate for Senator shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election any sum in the aggregate in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That no candidate for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum in the aggregate exceeding $10,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election," etc.

The Michigan State statute is act No. 109 of the Laws of 1913, on pages 189 et seq., entitled "An act to regulate and limit nomination expenses." Section 1 provides:

"No sums of money shall be paid and no expenses authorized or incurred by or on behalf of any candidate to be paid by him in order to secure or aid in securing his nomination to any public office in excess of 25 per cent of one year's compensation of the office."

Further down in the same section it provides that no sum for election shall be expended beyond 25 per cent of one year's salary, etc. Section 2 provides that "every political committee should appoint a treasurer, and that no money shall be expended except through him." Section 3 defines what are lawful expenditures. Section 4 provides that every candidate and every treasurer shall file full and complete statements within 10 days after primary or election. Section 11 provides that no person shall pay any expenses or make any payments except to a candidate or a political committee, and section 12 provides that there shall be no receipts except in the true name of the donor. Section 13 provides that no moneys shall be expended from any anonymous source. Section 18 provides for fine and imprisonment for any willful violation of the act.

From the various advertisements appearing in the Detroit and Michigan newspapers generally, and from other sources, it appears that a committee known as the Newberry-for-Senator committee ostensibly had charge of the management and conduct of Mr. Newberry's campaign. This committee for a period of several months, commencing in March of 1918 and continuing until after the primaries in August, maintained elaborate offices at rooms 308–310 Ford Building, Detroit.

M. A. A. Templeton, president of the Detroit Seamless Steel Tubes Co., acted as general chairman; Mr. Newberry is a large stockholder of this company, having originally financed Templeton in its organization; Mr. Paul H. King, an attorney and former receiver of the Pere Marquette Railroad, acted as executive chairman; Mr. Frank W. Blair, president of the Union Trust Co. of Detroit, as treasurer; Charles A. Floyd, as secretary; F. F. Emery, Harry O. Turner, James R. Davis, Terry T. Corliss, James F. McGregor, A. K. Moore, E. V. Chilson, James B. Haskins, B. F. Reed, assistant secretaries; director of publicity, H. A. Hopkins; publicity representatives, Thomas Phillips, B. C. Wilson, H. W. Rose, A. G. MacEachron, E. E. Smith, and E. O. McLean; attorney, Paul R. Dailey.

The report just mentioned was filed by the committee in the office of Milton Oakman, county clerk of Wayne County, where Mr. Newberry resides, on September 6, 1918, in compliance with act 109 of the Michigan public acts of 1913. It is signed and verified by Mr. Frank W. Blair, treasurer, and appears set forth in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, issue of September 17, 1918, on page 10387 and following. Mr. Newberry did not personally make any report under this act. Instead there appears in the miscellaneous files of the county clerk's office, attached to the committee report, a letter from Mr. Fred P. Smith, on the stationery of the executors of the Newberry estate, wherein the writer advises the county clerk that Mr. Truman H. Newberry states that he did not receive or disburse any money in connection with his campaign, and that the writer, Mr. Smith, therefore assumes that no personal report is required of Mr. Newberry. In this letter it is also said that should Mr. Oakman, the county clerk, place a different interpretation on the fact, upon information accorded to the writer, Mr. Newberry will report the facts as theretofore reported to the Secretary of the United States Senate.

I am informed that Mr. Newberry, in compliance with the Federal act, made personal reports of his campaign expenditures both before and after the primary. The prior statement is contained on one of the regular blank forms prepared for the purpose by the Secretary of the Senate. On page 2 thereof Mr. Newberry states: "The campaign for my nomination for United States Senator has been voluntarily conducted by friends in Michigan. I have taken no part in it whatever, and no contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge or consent." On the third page he states "no promise or pledge has been made by me or by anyone on my behalf with my knowledge or consent relative to the appointment of any person to a position of trust, honor, or profit either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or of any person in my candidacy." Mr. Newberry signs the statement "Truman H. Newberry, 123 Lake Shore Road, Grosse Pointe Farms, Mich." It was sworn to in the State of New York, county of New York, before Charles C. Schneider, notary public, August 14, 1918.

The primary was held on the 27th day of August. After the primaries Mr. Newberry filed another statement with the Secretary of the Senate, sworn to on the 29th day of August, 1918, in New York before Louis B. Wolf, notary, etc. This was on the regular blank furnished by the Secretary of the Senate for statements to be made after the primary. In the blank space on the second page relative to contributions there is written in ink the following: "None with my knowledge and consent." With reference to expenditures, in the blank space therefor, is written the following: "None with my knowledge and consent. I have read a general public statement of Paul H. King concerning expenditures made by a voluntary committee of my friends, but these were made without my knowledge or consent."

The first public outcry against the unlawful use of money, as stated, in Mr. Newberry's campaign, was made by the Hon. Lauren D. Dickinson, a prominent candidate for governor, reelected lieutenant governor of Michigan on the Republican ticket in the recent election. His public protest was published in all the prominent newspapers in Michigan on or about August 22, 1918, and is as follows:

[Detroit News, Aug. 22, 1918.]

Lieut. Gov. Dickinson's letter:

"Hon. TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
"Brooklyn Navy Yard, N. Y.

"DEAR SIR: Men of all walks of life who have the best interest of our State at heart believe the men who are conducting your campaign for United States Senator are conducting one that will bring one of the greatest scandals on our State that Michigan politics ever saw, and have asked me to take the lead in attempting to rid our State of this blight.

"I note by your statement that you say you do not know of these things.

"In giving you the information I will give you the terms that I hear everywhere in the 62 counties in which I have been recently. I have always had the highest regard for you and must believe you will relieve the Republican Party and the State of a campaign that is now being likened to the notorious Lorimer campaign of Illinois a few years ago. The terms 'boodle' and 'rotten' seem to be general terms that I hear.

"Every section of the State shows evidence of an expensive newspaper campaign, costing thousands and thousands of dollars. Thousands of men are liberally paid for work at many more thousands of dollars, an expensive suite of offices with a large force sending out hundreds of thousands of letters to influential voters at more thousands of dollars, thousands of autos already engaged for use on primary day at many more thousands; that practically every opponent of the primary system is backing your campaign, and that hundreds of the experts who have figured in or conducted for money the wet campaigns of the past are among the most active of your supporters.

"Conservative estimates say everywhere from $250,000 to $500,000 is being used. The good people of the State are apparently powerless to give the voters these matters on short notice. In case you get the most votes you must expect to have the placing of your name on the election ballot contested. If by technical reasons you succeed, then you must expect every church and moral organization to work until election night to keep our fair State from the baneful influence that success following such methods would leave for years to come.

"Should you be successful at the polls, you must expect a legislative investigation that would be demanded by an indignant populace. And if by technicalities you could overcome this, you will probably have to face a Democratic Senate, which will unseat you, as it justly unseated William Lorimer, jr., because of flagrant disregard in your behalf of Michigan's primary laws. The effect on the Republican Party, with the people demanding cleaner things, can not be estimated. Already we hear the Democrats will make the corrupting use of money in your campaign one of their great campaign arguments.

"I can not believe you understand the situation, and if you did you would come to the rescue. I am therefore asking you, in behalf of the old Republican Party, clean politics, preservation of the primaries, social and business interest, to withdraw from this campaign and save the everlasting disgrace to the party and the State from a pollution that would stay for years. Hoping you may act favorably and retain the high esteem in which you have been held in the State, I am,

"Sincerely, yours,
"L. D. DICKINSON,
"Lieutenant Governor of Michigan."

The other candidates on the Republican ticket in the late primary for the office of United States Senator from Michigan were: Hon. Chase S. Osborn, of Sault Ste. Marie, who had been twice governor of Michigan; Mr. Henry Ford; and Mr. William G. Simpson.

Representative Merlin Wiley, of Sault Ste. Marie, a member of the State Legislature of Michigan and Mr. Osborn's manager in the senatorial campaign, also made a public protest on the subject, which was published in the Detroit News on August 22, 1918, and probably in several other newspapers. It reads as follows:

[Detroit News, Aug. 22, 1918.]

LETTER OF REPRESENTATIVE MERLIN WILEY, OF SAULT STE. MARIE.

To the EDITOR: The campaign conducted on behalf of Mr. Newberry's candidacy for the United States Senate is a disgrace to the State of Michigan. Some one or some persons are incurring bills of tremendous size. They are incurred in behalf of Mr. Newberry's candidacy, and they must be paid by some one. Facts that can not be denied, because the knowledge of them is common property, attest the following:

First. A large and pretentious headquarters has been conducted for months in the Ford Building in Detroit, with a clerical force of from 30 to 40. Office rent and competent clerks cost money in Detroit.

Second. A force of Newberry workers of the class who seldom work without pay have been scouring the State for months doing organization work for Mr. Newberry's candidacy. They cost money.

Third. Banquets in county after county have been held, sometimes under the guise of patriotic meetings and sometimes plainly and boldly for Newberry organization work, as was the case of the banquet at Lansing, when the local Newberry organization was perfected, and the banquet of the Newberry workers of St. Clair at Marine City last Friday night. These things cost money, and these are war times and not time for political banquets.

Fourth. A superexpensive advertising campaign is being carried on, handled by a Detroit advertising company and carrying almost continuous advertising in nearly every one of the 700 papers in the State, both secular and religious. This costs money, and lots of it.

Fifth. It has been stated that a letter inclosing a return postal card, together with printed matter, has been sent to every voter in the State. This costs more money.

Sixth. It is stated that the Newberry organization plans to have autos in every voting precinct to bring out the Newberry vote on election day. This will cost still more money.

Seventh. The old-time politicians, the opponents of the primary system, and the "wets" are almost to a man supporting Mr. Newberry.

Eighth. Not a word, not a statement, not a single announcement of what he stands for has Mr. Newberry made. Even his campaign expense statement states that his campaign is being conducted by his friends without his knowledge or participation, and that no expenses have been incurred with his consent or authority.

These items cost money, more money than has ever been spent in a Michigan campaign, certainly in this generation. They are, in the amount expended, in plain and open violation of the letter and spirit of both the State and Federal laws. If Mr. Newberry should be elected, Michigan will have an election scandal worse than the Lorimer scandal in Illinois or the Stephenson scandal in Wisconsin. If this is to be the policy permitted in Michigan, then none but millionaires or men with millionaire friends who will pay the bills need apply for the office of governor or United States Senator, for only they can pay the price.

It is variously estimated that the entire cost of the Newberry organization and the conduct of Mr. Newberry's candidacy will have cost from $100,000 to $500,000. Certainly, it will cost enough to down the fair name of Michigan for a generation to come. And if Mr. Newberry should be nominated, he can never hope to take his seat. A United States Senate that, as Republican, would not permit William Lorimer to retain his seat and would seriously challenge the right of Senator Stephenson to a seat therein, will never, when Democratic, permit Mr. Newberry, if elected, to be seated after such campaign expenditures.

It is time for Michigan to wake up and shield her honor by administering a defeat that will forever make impossible the repetition of such methods.

MERLIN WILEY.

LANSING, MICH., August 20, 1918.

Mr. Simpson, one of the Republican candidates for Senator, mentioned above, likewise made public charges directed against the expenditures of the Newberry committee. One of his statements published October 6, 1918, is as follows:

[From the Detroit News, October 6, 1918.]

MR. SIMPSON ON THE SITUATION.

"To the EDITOR:

"Now that the Michigan Republican and Democratic conventions have been held, the stage seems to be all set for November, when the people can come forth and select their public servants (?).

"The army of 50,000 Republican joperatics in Michigan will be on the job as usual to do the bidding of the leaders who employ them, as will also as many of the Democrats who are equally fortunate in holding a political job.

"And the plain citizen voter—the man with whom lies the balance of power for good or evil, the man who is interested in politics only as a means of self-government—what will he do?

"The main contests, of course, will be the senatorship and the governorship.

"At present mud is flying in all directions, without, apparently, any desire for sensible reasoning, and the situation takes the phase of being grotesquely funny were it not a serious menace to our form of government.

"Ford says he is obeying the commands of the President.

"Newberry swears that he didn't know—that not even his wife told him that she spent $25,000 of his money to nominate him.

"Osborne charges Newberry with being an ass, but says that he will support him to show he's a good sport, even though he lost and Newberry flagrantly violated the law.

"Paul King—a lawyer, mind you—says he did it all for nothing, just as if he expected people to believe him.

"Gov. Sleeper—and his name seems quite appropriate in view of the facts—says he is neutral.

"The governor is doing the State a real service without cost by removing himself from office in the coming election. The people will do the rest.

"And Atty. Gen. Groesbeck—

"On the 24th of June I saw Mr. Groesbeck in his office, where I had called to protest the large expenditure of money by the Newberry people.

"'You are familiar with the corrupt-practices act, are you not?' I asked.

"'Well,' replied Mr. Groesbeck, 'I ought to, I am the attorney general of the State.'

"'I am well aware of that fact, Mr. Groesbeck,' I replied. 'As this effort is for a Federal office, I'm quite sure that if you won't act, Mr. Kinnane will.'

"He replied: 'Oh, you get me the facts, Simpson, and I'll act.'

"Mr. Groesbeck has had the facts for some time in the admission of Paul King, but has he acted?

"On July 20 I wrote regarding the matter to Mr. Kinnane and Secretary Lansing, at Washington.

"Did they act? Not yet.

"After the primary and on September 7, I again wrote to the governor and Secretary of State Vaughan, asking them to withhold Newberry's nomination certificate. Did they do so? The substance of the law which Newberry violated has been repeated so frequently in these columns it is unnecessary to do so again.

"I think that every voter who has any conscience at all will admit that Newberry has violated the law in spirit, if not in fact, though it pleases the interests with which he is connected to provide all manner of excuses, among which they say it was to save the country from Ford.

"The facts will show that they laid their expensive plans to deliberately violate the law long before Ford announced his candidacy, and there is no doubt in my mind but what they intended with premeditation to violate the law.

"Only a few days ago the State board of canvassers met to determine the ballot, and said, as reported, that I should have gone to Prosecutor Jasnowski.

"Always 'passing the buck' to others. This seems to be the feature of joperatic's job when he is called upon to earn his salary—at least in Michigan.

"Anyone who knows conditions, and who has gone to see Jasnowski on matters of this kind, knows what a fat chance I'd stand of having him do anything against the 'combine,' even if I could find the prosecutor.

"Here is a letter from Will Hays, which contains nothing that he could object to having printed:

"'MY DEAR MR. SIMPSON: Returning to-day after an absence, etc.

"'The unlawful use of money in an election can not be too strongly condemned. There is no penalty too severe or excoriation too vigorous for anyone guilty of such practices.

"'However, I am quite sure that there must be some mistake in the information which you have received regarding the unlawful use of money by Mr. Newberry. While I have known Mr. Newberry only a short time, I have known him by reputation a great many years, and while, as I understand, he is quite "well to do," as you say, I am very sure he would not under any circumstances indulge nor condone nor permit the unlawful use of money in connection with his candidacy for the nomination or election to any office.

"'I am glad, etc.,

"'Sincerely, yours,

"'WILL H. HAYS.'

"As to Mr. Hays's complacent belief in the virtue of others, I have nothing to say.

"How satisfying out of this mess of recriminations, senseless explanations, and excuses stand forth, like living words of fire, that every youth in Michigan would do well to remember, these words of our lieutenant governor, the man who knew, felt in his heart his duty, and dared:

"'I did what my conscience dictated. I have made enemies, but if I have opened the way for the correction of one of our greatest evils I am abundantly repaid.'

"Personally I refuse to believe other than in the old-fashioned goodness and honesty of the common people of Michigan.

"If the evils of which Newberry and his friends are charged are allowed to continue it means that we, the common people, must submit to rule by a class, and that class the rich class. We therefore lose our much-vaunted democracy.

"We read every day of current political differences, where matters of the war are brought into the argument, which are not appeals to reason but appeals to prejudice and self-interest.

"This line of argument gets us nowhere. Prominent business men are interviewed regarding Newberry and their replies printed. The major part of them, being of his class of self and social interest, say, in effect, 'To hell with the law; we want Newberry elected.' Those too cowardly to voice an opinion say nothing.

"The attitude of Thursday's convention shows that the reactionary element of the Republican Party is still in the saddle.

"After two sad presidential defeats under their rule they have yet to learn their lesson, and the idea does not seem to percolate through their thick craniums that the voting Republican citizens will not have that type of politics.

"It is not a question of loyalty between parties. It is a question of common honesty, decency, and principles among men.

"If we can look ahead to the sure defeat of Newberry we can see the just release of impending dishonor to the State, a dishonor invited by the leaders in power, and, as much as I would like to support Republican national principles, I can't vote a member of that party into an important office who has 'hit below the belt' to get there.

"Nor can I assist by my vote in the humiliation of the State which I love. If Newberry is selected this will surely be forced upon us by the body of men whose privilege it is to refuse to accept questionable associates.

"I hope to see every cowardly official connected with this disgraceful affair defeated at the coming election, and I shall vote for Bailey for governor, Dickinson for lieutenant governor, Masselink for secretary of state, and Baker for attorney general, and I know a few thousand others who will do the same.

"As for the senatorship, I won't vote for Newberry and I can't vote for Ford. I opine, however, that Ford will be elected by at least 20,000 majority.

"I'd rather be a prophet with a good vision than a forgetful historian that I might, perhaps, instill a ray of hope in the minds and hearts of the common people of Michigan.

"WM. C. SIMPSON."

I am informed that Mr. Simpson, as he states in his communication, did in fact file specific charges as to the unlawful use of money by Mr. Newberry, both with the attorney general of Michigan and the United States attorney for the eastern district of Michigan.

After the primaries at which Mr. Newberry received the Republican nomination, Mr. Newberry wrote Mr. Osborn in answer to a telegram as follows:

NEWBERRY'S LETTER.

"NEW YORK CITY,
"Sunday, September 1, 1918.

"MY DEAR GOVERNOR: Your cordial telegram assuring me of your earnest support is all that was needed to insure the defeat of Ford in November. I fully realize that my personality is submerged in the issues that confront our party in our State. Many times in the past few months I have envied your ability and privilege to talk, and when your voice rang clear and strong throughout State and Nation on the menace of Ford I wanted to wire you Godspeed in your patriotic work.

"Your deeply appreciated telegram of support helps me to visualize the statesman, the sportsman (hunter), and gentleman that I have always known you to be.

"Cordially, yours,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY."

In reply to this Mr. Osborn wrote him an open letter, which was published generally throughout Michigan, and which reads as follows:

"SEPTEMBER 17, 1918.

"MY DEAR COMMANDER: I have read your letter. Thank you for your sentiments. I shall support you. Already I have straightened out entanglements that would have been hurtful to your success. I am not interested in you personally a particle. The entire matter is so far beyond personal consideration and transcends individual proportions to an extent that only public welfare may be thought of. You can be elected; no doubt you will be. My idea is that the thing for you to do is to honestly confess that you broke the law and that you knew all about the campaign but that you did not realize the enormity of your offense. In such a position you would be intrenched in honesty, I fully believe. And an indulgent people would forgive you, and fight for you, because of the past services they think you have given and what they have been told you are giving now. In addition this action would make for your name an honorable place in the history of Michigan. Otherwise the future will curse you.

"The plea can not be honestly made that you spent money in excess because you were fighting Ford, because you had begun your reckless campaign long before Ford was mentioned and had already transgressed the law. Nor can you plead 'you did not know.' That would prove you to be both an ass and a liar, which I choose to think you are not. I am for you only to save the Nation and the State from the curse of Fordism. A vote for Ford is a vote for the Kaiser right now, as I view the case.

"Yours, truly,

CHASE S. OSBORN."

Coming now to the facts as to Mr. Newberry's connection with the work of the committee, I am informed and believe that he was personally active in organizing his own campaign and that he conducted the same through the Newberry committee. This connection is shown by many facts and witnesses, as I am informed and believe, and, among other evidence of witnesses, as follows:

Chief manager and intimate friend of Mr. Newberry was Mr. Fred Cody, who has an office in the downtown section of New York, and who ostensibly is an insurance man, but who is principally a lobbyist for the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., the American Book Co., Standard Oil Co., and other large and important Wall Street interests.

Mr. Cody was active, as I am informed and believe, from before the beginning of the organizing until after the election, and was constantly in communication with and in the office of the committee, and in and out the apartment and office of Mr. Newberry, conferring and giving directions with respect to the campaign.

Mr. Cody, at the outset of the campaign, went to Washington and at the direction of Mr. Newberry tendered the appointment of manager of the campaign to Mr. Jay G. Hayden, Washington correspondent of the Detroit News. Mr. Cody took Mr. Hayden to New York to see Mr. Newberry, where the appointment was tendered to Mr. Hayden by Mr. Newberry personally. The whole subject was gone into at great length between Mr. Newberry, Mr. Hayden, and Mr. Cody, with prospect of his making a success of the campaign. Mr. Hayden finally declined the position.

Subsequently in February of 1918, Mr. Cody, as I am informed and believe, arranged an interview between Mr. Milton Oakman, Mr. Robert Oakman, and others, of Detroit, with Mr. Newberry at the Biltmore. The parties all met there and discussed fully the prospects for a successful campaign of Mr. Newberry, the amounts of money that would be required, and the place of manager was tendered to Mr. Milton Oakman, as I am informed and believe.

Mr. Milton Oakman acted as manager for a time, as I am informed, but subsequently a more elaborate organization was organized and conducted under Mr. Templeton and Mr. Paul King. Mr. Milton Oakman continued to act for Mr. Newberry in Wayne County (Detroit) until after the primary election. Mr. Oakman had been sheriff of Wayne County twice and also then and is still clerk of Wayne County, and the leader of the dominant Republican faction in Wayne County. Very scandalous stories have been in circulation as to the large amounts of money expended by Mr. Oakman on behalf of Mr. Newberry. If such were expended they are not set forth in the accounts of the committee.

Mrs. Louisa Delamater, a stenographer, now employed at 316 Moffat Block, Detroit, Mich., states she was employed in the Newberry campaign headquarters at the Ford Building from about the 5th of March until April 20, 1918. That during her employment therein Mr. Newberry at least twice to her personal knowledge was in the Detroit campaign office, and that on the first visit she saw Mr. Emery show Mr. Newberry through the entire suite of about eight offices, pointing out to him things of interest as Mr. Newberry was shown through. She also says that she knows that railroad reservations to New York and hotel accommodations were made for persons in the Detroit office, who went to New York for the purpose of consulting Newberry about campaign methods.

Mrs. Delamater also states that Miss Margaret Nevin was the private secretary at campaign headquarters for Paul King, and that she must also have seen Newberry in that office. After Mrs. Delamater ceased working for the campaign committee a Miss Chappell was employed there. When Mrs. Delamater was there Mr. Emery was the office manager. She believes he had something to do with one of the Detroit draft boards. Another of the stenographers who was there while Mrs. Delamater was employed is Ruth Goldstein, of 111 Edmund Street, Detroit, Mich., also Florence Shepiro.

According to Mrs. Delamater, Miss Nevin wrote letters on Mr. Newberry's private stationery, which she sent by parcel post to New York for Mr. Newberry's signature. Mrs. Delamater herself wrote letters to railroads to make reservations to New York for Mr. Templeton and Mr. King; also letters to New York making appointments for Mr. King with Mr. Newberry.

I am informed that Thomas C. Smythe, of Detroit, Mich., before the primaries, saw Mr. Newberry in the offices of the committee from a window in the Moffatt Block, which is directly opposite the offices of the committee in the Ford Building, and not over 30 feet therefrom.

I am also informed and believe that Mr. Thomas Phillips, who was formerly employed on the staff of the Detroit News, was induced to take a position with the Newberry committee at a salary that is nearly twice the sum that he received from the Detroit News; that he went to New York and consulted with Mr. Newberry with reference to the preparation of advertisements to appear in Michigan newspapers; that he was in constant communication with Mr. Newberry while writing these intimate advertisements, and that Mr. Newberry cooperated with him in their preparation

Mr. Clarence L. Sibbens, 1224 Ford Building, Detroit, Mich., was Paul King's personal secretary during the campaign; he traveled all over the State with King before the primaries, and also went with him to New York at different times. He is a stenographer and is now employed in the office of Mr. Fred P. Smith, in charge of the offices of the executors of the Newberry estate. Sibbens has probably been taken into the regular employ of the Newberry family. These offices were used for private dictation of King, Emery, and others of the committee, I am informed and believe.

It can be shown without question that Mr. Newberry was in constant touch with the committee almost daily by telephone, telegraph, and written communications, receiving practically continuous reports of the work of the committee and communicating with its various members, both in Detroit and at New York, entertaining them at the Biltmore in New York, and communicating with them verbally, by writing and by telegraph, and also through Mr. Frederick Cody. This can be shown by examination of the following witnesses, as I am informed and believe, Templeton, King, Blair, and the various assistant secretaries above mentioned.

I have been appraised through the press that a Federal grand jury investigation on this subject was held in New York City preceding the Michigan primary. In this connection it was stated in the dispatches that the following persons most closely and directly associated with Mr. Newberry in the campaign refused to testify, and were thereafter ordered to testify by two different Federal judges. That they persisted in their refusal and were then committed to the Tombs for such refusal, namely: A. A. Templeton, general chairman; Frank W. Blair, treasurer; and Thomas P. Phillips, publicity agent. It was also stated in the newspapers that the following persons, called as witnesses before the same grand jury, indicated that they would likewise refuse to testify, following the course of the three witnesses mentioned. These others who were not committed include the following: John S. Newberry, a brother of the candidate, who furnished upward of $99,000 of the committee moneys; Paul H. King, the Michigan manager of the campaign; Milton Oakman, campaign manager for Wayne County; and H. A. Hopkins, director of publicity.

Besides the upward of $175,000 expended and admitted by the committee to have been expended, I have been informed through a number of persons throughout Michigan that other large amounts of money were expended, which moneys are not shown or accounted for by the committee, and I am informed and believe that these facts can be substantiated by a large number of witnesses, among whom are the following:

William Moore, of Wayne, Mich.; Mr. Jameson, attorney, Wayne, Mich.; Mr. Harrison (whose full name can be obtained), Wayne, Mich.; Frank Schumaker, Ann Arbor, Mich.; Frank Newton (late candidate for Congress from the second district), Ypsilanti, Mich.; Mr. Owen, ex-postmaster, Ypsilanti, Mich.; Thomas M. Ward, 1202 Houseman Building, Grand Rapids, Mich.; George Welsh, C. A. Terrie (Daniels), George Rodgers, James Quinlan, Oscar Kilstron (of the Bolo Club), William J. Mickele, Robert G. Bell (county clerk), George Reed (clerk of police court), Dan Kennedy, William Grove, and James Healy, all of Grand Rapids, Mich.; Neal McMillan, of Rockford, Kent County, Mich.; Charles H. Bender, Grand Rapids, Mich.; S. F. Bernard, Battle Creek, Mich.; Charles Biggers, Marshall, Mich.; John La Rue, of Lakeview, Montcalm County, Mich.; Mr. Kennedy, postmaster at Lakeview, Mich.; F. M. Lothrop, probably of Lakeview but whose exact address can be obtained; E. J. Bowman, Greenville, Mich.; J. W. Hoskins, of Howard City, Mich.; William T. Hosner, of Romeo, Mich.; Judge James G. Tucker, of Mount Clemens; Thomas Barkworth and John Miner, both of Jackson, Mich.; C. J. De Land, Jackson, Mich.; Emery Mills, Monroe, Mich.; Lee Wilbur, Ypsilanti, Mich.; Mr. Hawthorn, Wayne, Mich.; Ira Wilson, Plymouth, Mich.; Phillip Cottrell, Jackson, Mich.; Ivan George English, publisher of Daily Mirror, Escanaba, Mich.; Albert J. Young, Escanaba, Mich.; Judd Yelland, Escanaba, Mich.; Sherman Olmstead, Midland, Mich.; Rogers Andrews, Menominee, Mich.; Mr. Rice, attorney, Battle Creek, Mich.; Ike Bloom, Kalamazoo, Mich.; Bill Yearnb, Cadillac, Mich.

Many other names of men can be obtained if an investigation finds it necessary.

I have reason to believe that witnesses may be obtained in nearly every county of the State showing that large sums of money were expended in them before the primaries which are not set forth or included in the committee report.

I am forwarding to the committee a copy of the Saginaw Valley Farmer, a prominent farm newspaper, for August, 1918. In it you will see a sample of the lavish expenditures of money on behalf of Mr. Newberry. You will find advertisements and reading articles on 10 pages of this issue, which contains only 24 pages in all.

Newberry's campaign was advertised in practically all of the newspapers of the State of Michigan in the most lavish manner.

I am also informed and believe that several speakers were engaged for the primary campaign whose names do not appear in the committee report under their list of expenditures. One of these speakers, whom I have been informed was engaged to travel in the western part of the State of Michigan, was Mr. Horatio Earle, of Detroit. I have been unable to find his name in the committee report.

A great deal of evidence in addition to the suggestions above made could be obtained by a more thorough investigation.

Respectfully submitted.

ELBERT H. FOWLER.

The following is taken from the inaugural address of Lieut. Gov. Dickinson, of Michigan, which was delivered in the Senate of Michigan on Wednesday, January 1, 1919. The Senate of Michigan is composed entirely of Republicans, and Lieut. Gov. Dickinson is himself a Republican, who announced in the public press just before the election that he would vote for Mr. Newberry. The following clipping contains all that Lieut. Gov. Dickinson said in his inaugural upon the subject:

Lieut. Gov. Dickinson in his inaugural covers a number of subjects with a few words each. With reference to the Newberry campaign, he said:

PRIMARY CHANGES ASKED.

"Primary elections will call for action on your part. From what has occurred during the past political campaign it would afford me relief if I could pass by this question, but experience teaches that the disagreeable acts of an office are the ones the people demand the most strenuously. More communications on this line asking for legislative action have come to me by far than all others combined and almost without exception, Republicans not only from all parts of Michigan but from other States.

"This, you know, is the outgrowth of a candidacy that doubtless cost more money than ever before was paid for a nomination for office in all the world's history.

CLAIMS G. O. P. NEAR DEFEAT.

"You also know this candidacy from one of the best-known families of the State, of a man of high standing, unquestioned integrity, and acknowledged ability, in the face of an abnormally large party majority, came near an ignominious defeat through the resentment from nearly every voting precinct in the State, of the farmer, the laborer, the business and professional voter, because of the enormous amount of money acknowledged to have been used in his behalf and generally believed to have been used contrary to laws, several sections of which were enacted for the stipulated purpose of restricting the use of large sums of money in campaigns.

"The case is now agitating Congress, the Federal and Michigan courts, with a strong suspicion by many that for political purposes it will be there suspended as long as possible before the country at large as an unsavory act of the Republican primary in Michigan, hoping by such course to produce an effect that will deprive the party of the majority secured at the November elections.

SHOULD AMEND PRIMARY ACT.

"If the courts had given a decision as to who is to blame for this undesirable condition it would have cleared the way for your action. If, however, there is any question as to violation of the primary statute, it should be so amended that the interpretation relative to restrictions in the use of money and who to blame for violation shall be made plain and simple.

"In legislative action I believe the utmost caution should be used to eliminate the name of any candidate and avoid all appearance of politics in considering this subject. The individual, or even party, interests are of but little note when the sanctity of the ballot and safety of democracy are at stake.

REPORTS MANY COMPLAINTS.

"From almost every part of the State have come to me pleas that this legislature make it impossible in the future to witness the sale of a public office on the auction block, but rather that the laborer, the farmer, the business or professional voter, however humble, but able and respectable, may have a chance with the man of millions.

"The war's end has been termed a victory for safe democracy. No democracy is safe with a polluted primary or election, made so by money or otherwise. And no great amount of money will be used except for the purpose of making votes, and to make votes by the use of money is polluting, corrupting, and the user should be treated as a baser criminal that the laborer who steals a sack of flour for his family.

MUST PROTECT WOMEN VOTERS.

"It has been said that these things have been done by all parties in the past. If this be true, article 3, section 8, of the State constitution, as well as the new epoch, demands better things, and in accord with organized society's action already taken we are obligated, as far as legislation can do, to clean up on this line.

"It must be done if we are to preserve our party from political filth and do our part in making democracy safe, and it should be done before our women have experience at primary or election that they may never know by observation these things that have influenced past elections."

DAVID LUBIN—INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on the 14th of December Mr. David Lubin, the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture, at Rome, wrote a letter, in which he inclosed an article just prepared by him and published in pamphlet form on the subject of "Our Foreign Trade After the War."

Mr. Lubin originated the idea of and founded the International Institute of Agriculture. Through the material assistance and encouragement of the King of Italy, whom Mr. Lubin was able to interest in the enterprise, the institute was successfully established at Rome. Mr. Lubin was the American delegate continuously from the beginning. He was an extraordinary man—philanthropic, public-spirited, patriotic, great-hearted, and gifted with rare vision, real energy, and marked ability in constructive efforts to serve the highest good of his fellow men. He was intensely devoted to the interests of those who till the soil and produce the food for the people of the world. He gave much thought and time to a consideration of the problems affecting agriculture, especially production and distribution, the two great problems involved in establishing a sound agriculture.

I ask that this article by Mr. Lubin, his last thought on the subject of "Our Foreign Trade After the War," which is comparatively brief, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR FOREIGN TRADE AFTER THE WAR—A NEW OBJECTIVE—A PROPOSAL FOR EXPANSION.

(By David Lubin, Delegate of the United States, International Institute of Agriculture, Rome.)

"THE POTENTIAL POSSIBILITIES.

"In viewing the prospects for national progress it is all a question of getting the right focus, the right perspective. Before the war a billion dollars was considered a very large sum. Now, thanks to the liberty bonds and the war costs, we have become accustomed to calculating in terms as high as five billions, and presently our calculations may with continued progress be in terms of ten billions, and in time they may even reach the $20,000,000,000 mark. And it is open to us reach these high objectives if we but develop the potential possibilities for enlarging our foreign trade.

"Please observe: It needs no elaborate argument to show the economic advantage of steam and electric power and machinery over hand labor; how vastly these multiply production, how effective they displace handmade goods. And yet, by far the greater part of the world is still producing its goods by hand labor. And right here is our opportunity. We should do all in our power to displace these handmade goods by machine made. By so doing we should build up a very large foreign trade, a foreign trade which would rapidly enable us to jump from the billion-dollar mark to the five-billion mark, and from that to the ten billion, yes, and to the twenty-billion-dollar mark, and so on higher and ever higher.

"But how displace? Shall it be by pushing our goods through the means of commercial travelers with their sample trunks? We have tried that, and so have the Germans. We made but little progress; the Germans, however, managed to rake in about all the foreign trade that could be had that way; indeed, it was the profit on this trade which enabled them to build up their vast military establishment.

"THE OBSTACLES IN THE WAY.

"As I pointed out in a former paper on this subject—Atlantic Monthly, December, 1918—the greater part of the world is still of the nonprogressive, static order; hence the reluctance to take kindly to things it is not accustomed to. Then there is the diversity of the tastes and styles of the various ethnic groups composing the nations of the Old World which renders trade from standard patterns exceedingly difficult. It therefore requires much patience and no little ingenuity to build up a market in those fields.

"From time to time the American or the British commercial traveler appears on the scene, exhibits his samples, and in the usual businesslike way calls for orders. The German trader on the ground is not disconcerted a bit, for he knows by experience that these travelers will receive no orders. The American commercial traveler's rush for orders is much like a skirmish; the German makes of it a siege. The American runs in and runs out of a given territory, quite often without any orders; the German stays, holds on, and squeezes out all the business to be had. It thus comes to pass that the German is master of the situation. He knows how to curry favor, how to knuckle down, how to cave in. In fact, he is protean and eel-like in his suavity, master of the art of ingratiating himself with a customer. And for all these reasons the German merchant is able to build up and substantially hold the said markets all to himself.

"There is, besides, another point for consideration. We have been repeatedly told that in Germany the fostering of foreign trade was broadly given the right of way. That is to say, if an industry was started which the Government thought desirable to push forward, all obstacles in its way were brushed aside. If an item required it, it was given special subsidies and privileges, special transportation rates, special fiscal advantages, special diplomatic and consular services; and if an existing law stood in the way that law was, in that instance, set aside.

"Now, would we be willing to do all these things? Could we do them even if we wanted to? Do we not see that only under an autocracy is it permissible to do what Germany has done to foster foreign trade? Do we not see that such things are not permissible under a stable, constitutional democracy?

"ANOTHER APPROACH.

"But even with it all, the German just about managed to skim the surface, for the high possibilities in foreign trade are to be reached by another approach.

"The following, then, is a brief outline of that approach. It is submitted with some diffidence, for I fear that at first reading it may be set aside without further ado, as, on the face of it, it may seem paradoxical. Usually business seeks to avoid competition, whereas this proposal seems, at first glance, to go out of its way just to promote such competition. But due consideration will, I believe, win for it assent.

"Briefly, then, the approach is through the upbuilding of manufacturing centers with their factories in the countries where it would be an economic advantage to replace handmade by machine-made goods. Such factories should be under local ownership and direction. Local ownership and direction would soon overcome the prejudice against change from handmade to machine-made goods, and would likewise overcome the obstacles due to diversity in tastes and styles. Then, again, the employment at a higher wage rate of local labor in the factories would soon overcome the economic hostility to which imports of manufactured goods would tend to give rise. And finally, while the importation of manufactures is usually hindered by clamors for high tariff, no such hindrance is placed in the way of the importation of raw materials required for home industries.

"But how could such manufacturing centers, with their factories, be built up? Would local initiative suffice? No; it would not; the potentialities may be there, but they will have to be awakened, supplemented by American cooperation, by American capital, by American genius, by American skill, and trained under American expert guidance. And right here is our opportunity. We should make it our business to take a hand in building up such factories and in directing and supervising them until local labor, local direction, and local management become sufficiently competent and expert to run them.

"A MUCH LARGER NET RETURN.

"And right here the question arises, Why should the American people go out of its way to engage in the task of helping to build up industries in foreign countries? Should we not be building up competitors who would not only be likely to spike the guns of our foreign trade but who might in time even throttle us on our home markets?

"At first glance this would seem to be the case, but some reflection will show that there is little to fear from the legitimate competitor. For instance, the most forceful competitor of the United States is Great Britain, and the most forceful competitor of Great Britain is the United States; yet, notwithstanding, the United States is Great Britain's biggest customer and Great Britain is the biggest customer of the United States.

"In countries where we now have but an insignificant volume of foreign trade the proposed plan would undoubtedly create a steady demand for our money, our carriage, our raw material, our 'findings,' our semimanufactured articles, our machinery, etc. All this, taken in the aggregate, would insure a very much larger volume of foreign trade and would yield a very much larger net return than is possible through the sale of manufactured goods under the sample-trunk system.

"Of course, the proposed network of factories could not be expected to spring up of a sudden, like Minerva, fully armed, from the head of Jupiter, complete and efficient. It would, on the contrary, be of slow growth. The proposal could be started on a very modest scale. Say a factory is started as a sample test in a given field; if it met with success, it would lead to the upbuilding of other factories in the same field. In this way many locations would in time be built up and developed.

"FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES.

"In substance, under the proposed plan, the foreign-trade markets of the world would be divided into zones, each with one or more manufacturing centers, each of which may be designated as an industrial and distributing base for the zone.

Take, for instance, the Mediterranean Basin as one of these zones. Draw a line from Gibraltar to Syria and let the countries north, south, and east of that line form that zone, with Italy as its base. Similar zones could be formed in other parts of the world, as, for instance, in the Scandinavian countries, in Central America, in South America, in Russia, etc.

"Let each base in a zone be placed on an up-to-date industrial footing; let the factories be provided with the most effective modern machinery; let each industry be placed on a sound financial basis, and, above all, let it be placed under skilled, expert direction.

"Should the proposal here suggested be proceeded with, it is, of course, to be expected that England, too, would take a hand in the effort. As Sir Samuel Hoare says, 'The idea could be extended so as to include Great Britain.' Sir Charles Macara, founder of the International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners, writes me that he highly approves of the proposal and is placing it before the leading papers of England for the consideration of the British public. In the opinion of Sir Thomas Elliott, 'the proposal is a sound one.' And Lord Bryce in commenting on it says, 'There can be no doubt that there will be a great field for the development of the Mediterranean countries by British and American capital,' and he points out that this is equally true of Russia and of Siberia.

"ITALY AS A BASE.

"This proposal is not put forth as a doctrinaire thesis; it is a practical work now under way in Italy. It has been under discussion for some time past by a number of leading Italians, including members of the Italian ministry. It met with general favor, and a hearing was requested of Ambassador Page, which was granted on June 5. The Duke Colonna di Cesarò then handed in the following (which I quote from my article on this subject in the December issue of the Atlantic Monthly):

"Italy is too young a country and too short of capital to exploit by herself all her resources and to develop industries and commerce on rational and organic lines.

"This is the reason why she turned to German capital, which, however, gradually and subtly drew into its meshes all the country's economic life, cramped her industries and her trade where they opposed German interests, introduced everywhere German technical men, who proved to be all German agents, and bound political groups and men so that Italy was practically deprived of her free agency and her life was stifled and paralyzed.

"Before the war and even now during the war events have shown the international force which animates all currents tied to German interests.

"The ambassador seemed favorably impressed with the proposal. As a result of this hearing it was decided to go ahead with it, and an important step in this direction has been taken. On October 16 a meeting was called in Rome by Signor Ciuffelli, Italian minister of commerce, at his ministry, at which leading Italians were present. The plan we are here considering was approved, and it was decided that an effort be made to have Italy become a base for the industrial and commercial development of the Mediterranean Basin on modern lines, and to ask the aid of the American people toward bringing this about.

"A committee was appointed, with Ernesto Nathan, former mayor of Rome, as chairman, to take this matter in hand. In response to requests for adherence this committee has already received favorable replies from bodies representing leading industries, among them the metallurgical, the engineering, the silk, and the cotton-spinning industries. A meeting will shortly be called to effect a permanent organization for the purpose of proceeding on with the work in Italy, when an endeavor will be made to interest the American people in the proposal.

"ROME, November 5, 1918."

Mr. FLETCHER. Following this, I ask also to have printed an announcement of the death of Mr. Lubin and something of a sketch of his life as it appeared in the Washington Post of January 2.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DAVID LUBIN DIES IN ROME AT 77—SAN FRANCISCAN FOUNDED INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

ROME, Wednesday, January 1.

David Lubin, of San Francisco, founder of the International Institute of Agriculture and the American representative on its permanent board, died here to-day of pneumonia. His fatal illness followed an attack of grippe.

David Lubin, formerly a merchant in Sacramento, conceived the idea of the International Institute of Agriculture, and it was through his efforts that the institute was founded. The institute issues reports and other data on world crops and imports and exports.

The treaty providing for the institute was ratified by 53 nations, and the institute has an annual income of $60,000 from the Italian Government. On the occasion of the general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture in Rome in 1913 Mr. Lubin was presented with a silver cup in appreciation of his efforts in originating the institute.

Since 1913 he spent most of his time in Rome in connection with the institute. One of his last public utterances, on October 21, was to urge the allies to organize to meet a German industrial war after the war. Mr. Lubin was born in 1841.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr President, the entire country was startled to-day by the announcement of the death of ex-President Roosevelt at his home on Long Island at an early hour this morning.

This is not a fit time, Mr. President, for me to undertake to eulogize the memory and achievements of ex-President Roosevelt, but before I submit a motion to adjourn out of respect to his memory, which I shall present in a few moments, I will say just a very few words.

The life of ex-President Roosevelt was full of activity and of achievement. In such a life, of course, he made antagonisms, but I do not believe there is a man in the broad limits of the United States who to-day, in the presence of this solemn announcement, would question the ability of ex-President Roosevelt, his patriotism, his courage, his devotion to duty as he saw it. He met all the responsibilities of citizenship in the most courageous manner. That he made mistakes was inevitable, for it is human to err; but certainly it may be said without fear of contradiction that his errors were made in what he believed to be the best service of his country, for he was devoted to his country, and he hesitated at no sacrifice which he could make to promote its honor, its prosperity, and its welfare.

I will say, furthermore, Mr. President, that a characteristic of his life was his unqualified courage. He never had a conviction that he did not have the courage to follow. He was a man of unlimited courage, of limitless resources, and of unbounded patriotism.

As I said, Mr. President, fruitful as the subject may be, I shall not be drawn into any extended eulogy on the life and achievements of this truly great American, for I look upon him as one of the great men produced on this continent since the discovery of America.

Mr. President, I send to the desk resolutions which I ask may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 407), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and regret the announcement of the death of Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, late a President of the United States.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Senators be appointed by the Vice President, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise simply to second the resolutions offered by the Senator from Virginia. Mr. Roosevelt served his country in war; he was President of the United States; and as Vice President he presided over this body. He was a great patriot, a great American, a great man. He was devoted throughout his life to his country. He tried always to be a servant of humanity. At this moment, Mr. President, the thoughts and memories that crowd upon me make it impossible for me to say more.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, as a Senator from the State in which Col. Roosevelt lived and as one who believed in him and followed him in his leadership in the affairs of his State and the Nation, I am sure it will not be considered inopportune for me to say a word or two on this occasion.

At the time of his death Mr. Roosevelt was the foremost private citizen in the world. Of all those before the public at the time of his greatest activity, he made by far the deepest impress upon our national life.

As a citizen Mr. Roosevelt approached the ideal. His occupation was America. His relaxation was study. His pleasure was friendship. His family relations, too sacred to be lightly intruded upon, were those to which good men everywhere aspire and good women best understand and appreciate.

Dead in his sixty-first year, Mr. Roosevelt will number his real mourners by the million. Time and history will write his true epitaph. But we to-day can record the death of a great American, of whom it can truly be said that while he lived millions followed him because they believed in him as a force for righteousness, justice, peace, and progress, and when he died a whole people mourned him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Virginia.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to, and the Vice President appointed as the committee under the second resolution Mr. LODGE, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. REED, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr.

CURTIS, Mr. HARDING, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. CALDER, Mr. JOHNSON of California, Mr. KELLOGG, and Mr. KNOX.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I send to the desk another resolution, which I ask may be read and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 408) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriations for miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses of the Senate committee appointed to attend the funeral obsequies of Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, late a President of the United States, on voucher or vouchers properly allowed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported favorably the foregoing resolution and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of ex-President Roosevelt, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 7, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, our hearts are saddened by the news which has gone forth of the death of a great man. A statesman, a writer, a patriot, an ex-President of the United States has passed from the scenes of this earth to the realms beyond. He was great in thought, great in deeds, kindly in his ways, but keen in his conceptions of right. He was a despiser of all things that tend to lessen the good in life. His soul was wrapped up in the life and character of his Nation. He was bold, fearless, and always told what he believed to be the truth. We pray that his like may come again and awaken larger, nobler interests in the world and in life. He was brave, he was fearless, a strength wherever he went. Be with the family, who have suffered much in this war, through the loss of a son and two other sons wounded. Be with them and comfort them in this hour of sorrow and help them and us forward with the hope that that life still lives in the realms beyond, and guide us all by right and truth and justice. In Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 4, 1919, was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, in compliance with precedents I am about to make a motion to adjourn; but before doing so, I ask unanimous consent that business in order to-day be in order to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that business in order to-day be in order to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the country has heard with profound regret of the death of Theodore Roosevelt. Those who could not agree with him politically found in him a ready foeman, splendidly equipped to defend the positions he took. He was a man of tremendous energy, a perfect engine of force, and has rendered his country splendid service in the Army, as governor of our greatest State, as Vice President, and as President of the United States. He loved his country, and his long public career as well as his career since his retirement from public life was characterized by intense practical patriotism.

He won for himself an enduring place in literature, and if he had done nothing else than this he would have achieved a distinction which has come to but few men in his generation. His indomitable energy led him into the field of geographic exploration, and if his achievements were limited to that field alone he would have perpetuated his name to future generations. As commanding officer of the Rough Riders in Cuba he demonstrated that he was possessed of the courage and the ability out of which great soldiers are made. His military service, including his fearless demands for a redress of the grievances of the men in the ranks, alone would have won him a place in history. In addition, however, he served with distinction in the naval organization of the United States, and his career as Vice President and President has left an impress upon the history of his country which will endure.

His sturdy Americanism, his intense patriotism in peace and in war, in public office and as a private citizen, will always command the respect and the admiration of this and of future generations.

I send to the Clerk's desk the following resolutions and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 494.

The House having learned with profound sensibility and sorrow of the death of Theodore Roosevelt, former President of the United States:

Resolved, That as a token of honor to the many virtues, public and private, of the illustrious statesman, and as a mark of respect to one who has held such eminent public station, the Speaker of this House shall appoint a committee to attend the funeral of Col. Roosevelt on behalf of the House.

Resolved, That such committee may join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate to consider and report by what further token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the Nation.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy of the same to the afflicted family of the illustrious dead.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to present consideration of the resolutions?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, before the question is taken, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sadness and with deepest sorrow, not alone of the district of which he was a resident or of the State of which he was a citizen, but of the Nation of which he was a part, that I second the motion of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. The life that has just closed was the fullest expression of Theodore Roosevelt's conception of what life should be. He himself said:

The life of duty, not the life of mere ease or of mere pleasure; that is the kind of life which makes great men, just as it makes a great nation.

His life was a fulfillment of the noble sentiment—

God give us men—
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy,
Men whom the lust of power will not kill,
Men who are honest men, who will not lie.

Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flattery without wincing.
Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 7, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a detailed report of the expenditures of all moneys appropriated under the act of August 10, 1917, from August 10 to June 30, 1918, inclusive (H. Doc. No. 1642); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting estimates of appropriation, with the recommendation that they be given favorable consideration for inclusion in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 1643); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13548) to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 891), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURNETT: A bill (H. R. 13669) to prohibit immigration for a period of four years, and to restrict immigration thereafter; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 13670) to amend the war-risk insurance act by providing for the transfer of jurisdiction of, and all claims for, compensation for death or disability from the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance to the Bureau of Pensions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a resolution (H. Res. 493) amending paragraphs 25 and 26 of Rule XI; to the Committee on Rules.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII,

Mr. PARKER of New York laid on the Speaker's desk a petition of electors of district and State of New York relating to Senate bill 5306 and House bill 13159, which was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 7, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we worship Thee. Thou hast sent forth the spirit of Thy Son to the hearts of men crying "Abba Father." We are Thy children, and we are heirs of God. We would feel not only the sacred obligation but the high inspiration of the call of God to places of leadership and power. We pray that we may discharge our duties as the sons of God to extend Thy kingdom and the spirit of Thy peace among men. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not been informed officially with reference to the funeral services over the body of the late President of the United States in any other way than by the newspapers. The newspaper announcement is that it is to be a private funeral. The Senate, however, having taken steps to send a committee, the Chair wishes to announce that if any Senators desirous of going will communicate with the Sergeant at Arms, arrangements will be made for their transportation and comfort.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it has been ascertained that some of the Senators appointed yesterday as members of the committee to attend the funeral of the late ex-President Theodore Roosevelt are either out of town or are unable to accompany the congressional committees to-day. I ask, therefore, that five additional names be added to the Senate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair appoints the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as additional members of the committee.

SENATOR FROM NEVADA.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read the certificate of election of Hon. CHARLES B. HENDERSON, Senator elect from the State of Nevada to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Francis G. Newlands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read.

The credentials were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

STATE OF NEVADA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 5th day of November, 1918, CHARLES B. HENDERSON was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Nevada a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States and to fill the vacancy therein caused by the death of Francis G. Newlands, and that said vacancy was filled by the election of CHARLES B. HENDERSON as aforesaid, according to law.

Witness, his excellency our governor, Emmet D. Boyle, and our seal hereto affixed at Carson City, this 30th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1918.

EMMET D. BOYLE, Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.] GEORGE BRODIGAN, Secretary of State.

Mr. KING. Senator HENDERSON is in the Chamber, and I ask that the oath may be administered to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the credentials? If not, the Senator elect will present himself at the desk for the purpose of taking the oath of office.

Mr. HENDERSON was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. KING, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

SENATOR FROM KANSAS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I present the certificate of election of ARTHUR CAPPER, Senator elect from the State of Kansas. I ask that the credentials may be read and filed. They are in the regular form.

The credentials were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

State of Kansas, certificate of election—United States Senator from Kansas.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 5th day of November, 1918, ARTHUR CAPPER was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Kansas a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1919.

Witness, his excellency our governor, ARTHUR CAPPER, and our seal hereto affixed at the State capitol in the city of Topeka, this 2d day of December, in the year of our Lord 1918.

ARTHUR CAPPER, Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.] J. T. BOTKIN, Secretary of State.

CAPITAL ISSUES COMMITTEE (S. DOC. NO. 328).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Capital Issues Committee, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 15, 1918, a statement showing the total expenses of the Capital Issues Committee to December 31, 1918, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES (S. DOC. NO. 327).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees in the department January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the death of Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, former President of the United States.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the National Association of Woolen and Worsted Overseers in convention assembled at Worcester, Mass., favoring a protective tariff, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of sundry citizens of Worcester, Mass., favoring the freedom of Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the Western Fruit Jobbers' Association, submitted by E. P. Stacy & Sons, of Minneapolis, Minn., relative to the disposition of Federal controlled utilities, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CALDER. I present resolutions unanimously adopted at a meeting of the members of the parish of the Blessed Sacrament Church, in Brooklyn, N. Y., held under the auspices of the Parish Forum on Thursday, December 19, 1918, favoring self-determination for Ireland. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Resolutions adopted unanimously at a meeting of the members of the parish of the Blessed Sacrament, held under the auspices of the Parish Forum on Thursday evening, Dec. 19, 1918, favoring self-determination for Ireland.]

Whereas recent articles in the metropolitan press, including some well-displayed utterances of certain of our public men, seem to be inspired by forces who desire to discredit the efforts of our great President toward the estiblishment of a just basis for a permanent peace; and

Whereas in such an emergency it is incumbent upon all loyal citizens who believe in the justice of the principles enunciated by our President to make their voices heard in opposition to the efforts of those evil or misguided men;

Therefore the members of the Parish of the Blessed Sacrament and their friends, in public meeting assembled on this 19th day of December, 1918, declare:

That we rejoice with our fellow citizens at the victorious conclusion of the war and the triumph of the ideals for which America entered the war.

That we take justifiable pride in the record for bravery and patriotic fervor made by the men of the Irish race in the Army and Navy and the important part they played in the decisive battles for the democratic freedom of the world.

That we applaud the determination of our President to be present at and participate in the proceedings of the peace congress, to the end that full effect be given to the principles enunciated by him in his addresses to Congress, his state papers, and his speeches, which have been accepted by the American people as the true reason and purpose of America's participation in the war.

That the most important of those principles—that of self-determination as to the form of government by the consent of the people who are to be governed—should be applied to the people of Ireland in conformity with America's declaration.

That the Irish people are by race, language, and tradition a distinct and separate people; that their country is a nation with well-defined geographical boundaries; that they have exercised sovereign rights for a thousand years and have been deprived of them by force; that they have never surrendered or compromised those rights; that they have not ceased to struggle, morally and physically, to recover those rights; that they are withheld from them by force; and that the only rule which prevails in their country to-day is the rule of force against the will of the people.

That on every battle field, from the earliest in the Revolution to the latest in France, where American ideals were fought for and American institutions and interests defended, the Irish race in America have freely given their blood and lives and linked themselves with everything so essentially American that with truth and confidence they may now say to their country in this supreme hour, "Stand for the people whose sons have stood for you and show grateful recognition as well as vindicate right and justice."

Therefore we respectfully but earnestly urge that our President declare at the peace congress that the people of Ireland should, as matter of right and justice, be governed only in accordance with their consent, and that the will of the majority—ascertained by a plebiscite of the adult population—be accepted as the sovereign will of the people instead of the present foreign rule by force.

JOHN J. FOOTE, Chairman.

Mr. CALDER. I present also a petition of citizens of the Borough of Richmond, city of New York, favoring self-determination for Ireland, which I ask be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas President Wilson has repeatedly declared that one of America's objects in entering the war was to secure for all small nations the right to determine for themselves the form of government under which they desired to live; and

Whereas on the strength of the President's declarations the American people sent their sons into the Army and Navy, poured out their blood and treasure lavishly, and Irish citizens performed their full share in the fighting and other sacrifices; and

Whereas Ireland is one of the small nations and has the same right to freedom as the others and, in addition, has struggled for freedom for centuries and her people are now more united in the determination to secure it than at any time in the last 700 years; and

Whereas it would be a travesty of justice to hold that men of Irish blood sacrificed themselves in this war to bring freedom to the Czechs, Serbs, Poles, Jugo-Slavs, and others, but not to the people of Ireland: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of the Borough of Richmond, city of New York, in mass meeting assembled at St. Peter's Hall, New Brighton, this 15th day of December, declare:

1. Our unqualified approval of the 14 terms of peace laid down by our President.

2. We heartily indorse his decision to participate in the peace conference in person.

3. We respectfully submit as our firm conviction that Ireland should be included among the small nations entitled to the right of self-determination by a vote of her adult population. Be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to our Representatives in Congress, with the request that they expedite, as far as in their power, the speedy adoption by Congress of one of the many resolutions now before that body relating to self-determination for Ireland.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from the Deadwood Business Club, of South Dakota, relative to the disposition of railroads, telegraph, telephone, and cable lines, and express companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEADWOOD, S. DAK., December 10.

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.:

Resolved, That it is the sentiment of the Deadwood Business Club that railroads, express companies, telegraph, telephone, and cable lines, which were taken over for operation by the Government as a war measure, should be returned to their respective owners for operation with least possible delay, that the country be restored to an industrial-peace basis as soon as possible.

DEADWOOD BUSINESS CLUB.

Mr. STERLING. I also send to the desk a letter and a resolution from the Farmers' Grain Dealers Association of South Dakota, relating to the disposition of railroads, which I ask may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK., December 28, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We realize that it will be some time before Congress will come to any conclusion as to the final disposition of the railroad question. Sentiment in South Dakota is very strong to have all public utilities turned back to private ownership in the shortest possible time, as all are convinced that Government control or ownership, with the menace of politics and inefficiency attached, are not the things that they want after a year of experience. In the meantime, and until this question is finally disposed of, our association, which is so vitally interested in all freight rates and all matters concerning transportation, requests that all rate making, investigating, and suspension powers be restored, absolutely as existing before the war, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, State railway commissions, and the courts, restoring to us our constitutional right of appeal. The Farmers' Grain Dealers Association of South Dakota, in convention assembled, therefore has adopted the following resolution by unanimous vote:

"In order to give fair and just representation to all shippers in all States and to guarantee against sudden unnecessary or unreasonable advances in freight rates, we demand that the rights be restored immediately to the State railway commission and to the Interstate Commission to suspend and initiate rates and to adjudicate all rates before same shall become effective, as authorized in the Cummins amendment or some similar act. Our secretary is hereby instructed to communicate these resolutions to our national Congressmen and Senators and to the South Dakota Railway Commission and the department of history of South Dakota.

"We ask you as our Representatives in Congress to support legislation to bring this about."

Very truly, yours,

FARMERS' GRAIN DEALERS ASSOCIATION OF SOUTH DAKOTA.
CHAS. H. EYLER, Secretary.

THE RAILROAD PROBLEM.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk an editorial taken from the New York Times of Sunday last relating to the same subject. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RAILROAD PROBLEM.

Private ownership and operation of the railroads, with Federal regulation, competition in service and facilities, but not in rates, and the delivery of the roads from the endless confusion of conflicting State regulations—that is the solution of the railroad problem favored by Judge Robert S. Lovett, one of the ablest and most experienced railroad executives of the country. Competition in rates, in his opinion, inevitably leads to rebates, secret rates, and other kindred evils; competition in facilities and in service produces better accommodation for the public and encourages initiative, enterprise, and the employment in railroad service of the best brains. It is notorious that public ownership everywhere exerts a deadening influence upon the development of the art and industry involved.

Under Federal ownership of the railroad systems of the country the public-buildings scandal would become vastly more flagrant. Just as Congressmen purchase the favor of their constituents at public cost by securing extravagant appropriations for post offices and customhouses, so wide-awake communities with an eye to their own interest would demand, and secure, fine new railroad stations and increased facilities which would not pay their costs. These are matters to be considered when Mr. McAdoo holds up to our view his picture of the benefits of Federal control. For one thing, first-class ability would disappear from railroad management; the compensation offered by the Government would not attract the kind of men that have built up and operated our great railroad systems; there would be no Vanderbilts, no James J. Hills, no Scotts, no Harrimans, no Lovetts, no Lorees, or Ripleys engaged in railroading.

The outstanding capitalization of all the railroads in the country amounted two years ago to $20,679,350,501—in stock, $8,958,815,811; in bonds, $11,720,534,690. The standard return upon the lines which Judge Lovett describes as class 1 roads, now under Federal control, amounts to upward of $900,000,000. Capitalized at 5 per cent, this would represent a little more than $18,000,000,000 of value. If the Government should acquire the roads, it would become obligated for this gigantic sum. The Treasury has sold $17,000,000,000 of liberty bonds; it must sell billions more. If we should add to the war debt thus created a railroad debt approaching $20,000,000,000, the Government would be loaded down with a burden of obligation never dreamed of before we entered upon this era of big figures.

It is all very well for Mr. McAdoo to argue, as he is doing before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, that an extension to five years of the period of Federal control is necessary to carry out improvements he has in mind. Although he disclaims any such purpose, the public is unable to see any difference between his argument for a five-year period and an argument for permanent Federal control, which would mean, of course, Federal ownership. That brings into view at once not only the very grave objections immediately related to railroad operation, objections which are lucidly presented by Judge Lovett, but it compels consideration of the fathomless sea of political evils into which we should be plunged by the enormous increase in the number of Government employees. Already organizations of railroad employees are petitioning for Government ownership. That was inevitable, it was foreseen, for Mr. McAdoo tells us that under his directorship wages have been advanced during the last year to an amount exceeding $600,000,000. An autocracy is the only form of government which would be proof against the tremendous political pressure arising out of Government ownership and operation of $20,000,000,000 worth of railroads. In a democracy no party, though it boasted of adamantine virtue, could resist it.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a short memorandum prepared by Hon. A. R. Smith, editor of the Marine News and former commissioner of navigation, in reference to the policy of discriminating import duties and tonnage dues for building up the merchant marine. It is a very clear and concise statement, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Memorandum regarding the policy of discriminating import duties and tonnage dues for building up and maintaining American shipping in foreign carrying.]

1. This policy was a part of the first tariff act, signed by President Washington on July 4, 1789.

2. At first it provided a 10 per cent discount of the duty on imports in American vessels; but this was too severe a drain on the National Treasury, so it was changed to an extra, higher duty on imports in foreign vessels, which added money to the National Treasury if it failed to help our ships. Tonnage dues were 50 cents a ton on foreign vessels each time they entered American ports, and only 6 cents a ton on American ships.

3. This policy was in full force from 1789 until 1815; thereafter it was in partial force until 1846, its provisions between times having been gradually suspended; but the original act has been upon our statutes since 1789, its operation merely suspended by other acts of Congress, as well as trade treaties, conventions, and agreements.

4. During the period the policy was in full force American ships averaged nearly 90 per cent of our entire foreign carrying.

5. As a result of over 60 consecutive years of full or partial operation its effects carried our shipping along fairly well until 1861, for 11 years after the suspension of the discriminatory laws became general.

6. During the first 72 years of our national existence under the present Constitution—1789 until 1861—an average of 80 per cent of our imports and exports were carried in American ships.

7. When this policy was in force the denial of American registry to foreign-built vessels gave protection to American-built vessels; but when the policy was suspended the denial of our registry to foreign-built ships ceased to constitute a protection. Foreign ships then enjoyed every right in our ports in foreign carrying that American ships enjoyed.

8. Retaliatory measures were resorted to by other nations, chiefly England, to offset the preference for American ships in American carrying established by this policy, but they failed; always they failed, the best proof of which is the proportion of our own carrying our own ships did while it was in force.

9. It was said that we could not abrogate in a wholesale way some 22 trade treaties in force between this country and other countries, by which we pledged ourselves not to resort to that policy; but other nations at different times have abrogated at least 15 such treaties, and everyone of them was affected and had to be altered when the seamen's act went into full effect.

10. Twice of recent years efforts have been made to revive this policy—in the Dingley tariff of 1897 and in the Underwood tariff of 1913—and the details of how the purposes of Congress were thwarted are most interesting.

11. It is the only specific affirmative policy for building up our shipping in foreign trade that the Republican Party ever declared for (in 1896 national platform), at which time the presidential candidate (Maj. McKinley) warmly indorsed it in his letter of acceptance of the presidential nomination.

12. This policy takes nothing out of the National Treasury, but rather adds money to it, and it protects our ships by the same instrument (the tariff) that every other American product subject to foreign competition is protected.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present resolutions adopted by the West Coast Lumbermen's Association in reference to a bill to restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission the powers it exercised before the war. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

THE AMERICAN SHIRE HORSE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present a communication from J. G. Truman, president of the American Shire Horse Association. It is one of probably a hundred letters, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. I do not ask that it be read. I selected it from the number. It is an objection to the return of the horses that are in the American Expeditionary Forces. It sets forth the dangers of communicating various diseases that are prevalent in horses abroad. The danger of communicating them here is very great.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN SHIRE HORSE ASSOCIATION,
BUSHNELL, ILL., December 13, 1918.

Senator L. Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been advised and it seemed to be common talk among horsemen at the International Live Stock Exposition last week that the Quartermaster General of the United States Army has decided to return to this country some of the horses and mules which have been shipped to Europe for military purposes.

Now, Senator, this will certainly be a very serious mistake if they bring even one of the horses that have been exposed to the diseases that exist especially among the Army horses on the other side. I would not for a moment, if I were you, allow the return of one Army horse. There really is no reason why they should be returned to this country on account of the fact that commercial horses in Europe are very scarce and high. The same horses that the Government has over there would bring practically twice the money that they would bring if brought back here, and in addition there would be the high cost of transportation.

In other words, if those horses were shipped back here they would not bring any more than enough to pay their transportation charges. It would certainly be a terrible disaster to have an epidemic imported to this country by European army horses along the same line that we are having with the Spanish influenza.

I trust that you will use your best efforts with the Quartermaster General of the Army and also Dr. J. R. Mohler, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Washington, D. C., both of whom we are writing.

I may say that in writing you I am representing no less than 1,073 of the leading draft-horse breeders of the United States.

Yours, very truly,

J. G. TRUMAN, President.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present from a number of communications of a like kind on universal suffrage a resolution of the Illinois Woman's Legislative Congress, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Illinois Woman's Legislative Congress, a delegate body representing the following organizations from all parts of the State, in convention assembled, December 27 and 28, 1918, at the Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill., does hereby urge the United States Senate to take speedy and favorable action on the Federal suffrage amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present and do not ask to have printed resolutions adopted by the Chicago Equal Suffrage Association, of the State of Illinois, on the subject of woman suffrage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie on the table.

FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. GORE. I present a series of resolutions and letters sent to me by a committee representing various farmers' organizations, desiring to have an investigation of the cost of producing farm products in general and sugar beets in particular. I move that the resolutions and letters be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

COST OF EAGLE BOATS.

Mr. LODGE. I present newspaper articles continuing those printed in the RECORD in regard to the Eagle boats. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Daily Iron Trade and Metal Market Report, Cleveland, Ohio, Dec. 30, 1918.]

FORD MAY GET NEW $3,500,000 RIVER ROUGE EAGLE PLANT FROM NAVY AT BARGAIN PRICE—CONTRACT SHOWS THAT FORD, WHILE DECRYING ALL WAR PROFITS, UNDER CONTRACT GETS HIS EARLY—NAVY IS SADDLING BIG EXPENSE ON COUNTRY—NAVAL OFFICERS CONDEMN STAND.

[This is the third article on Henry Ford's Eagle boats. These are 204-foot, single-screw, steel, 500-ton submarine chasers, costing about $550,000 each, of which the Navy intends to build 60, at a total cost of $33,000,000, although all need for them ceased with the signing of the armistice. The first article appeared last Thursday and the second last Friday.]

NAVY'S CREDIT RATING NOT HIGH WITH HENRY FORD.

"The fixed sum for profit shall be payable as follows: Ten thousand dollars shall be payable on each vessel as and when such vessel is half completed as certified by the inspectors; $9,000 shall be payable when such vessel is preliminarily accepted; and the remaining $1,000 to complete the $20,000 fixed profit payable on each vessel shall be held to constitute the special reserve. Such profits for profit shall be payable on the monthly bills of actual costs when and as accrued."—Ford Motor Co. Eagle contract.

"I will not take a cent of profit out of the war work I am doing. * * * It is impossible to determine in advance just what the cost of everything will be."—By Henry Ford.

MOST OF THOSE EAGLES, TOO, HAVE BEEN ETHEREAL.

The biggest thing Detroit is doing in a shipbuilding way is the Ford destroyers, officially know as the Eagle boats. Nothing like these boats has ever been built; I doubt if anything approaching the plant erected for their manufacture exists elsewhere. As I drove toward the glass-inclosed, gigantic structure, that somehow gives the impression of ethereal lightness and grace for all its straight lines and uncompromising angles, I could think of nothing but Keats's—

Of perilous seas in fairy lands forlorn."

True, the River Rouge is anything but "perilous seas." They had all but picked it up bodily and laid it aside, the day I was there, to give room for the dredges and pile drivers excavating the launching basin and building the permanent launching ways. There was the irresistible suggestion of magic, however, in the very thought that only a few months before these fields had indeed been "lands forlorn." Now thousands and before long tens of thousands of workers will be turning out Eagle boats, a ship a day.—Frank Parker Stockbridge in September, 1918, the World's Work.

Henry Ford's profit on his Eagle-boat contract with the Government may not be limited to $1,200,000 on 60 completed Eagles—submarine chasers that will never part water above an enemy submarine—and $300,000 to $400,000, possibly more, on 40 more or less completed Eagles that the Navy will take off his hands. Detroit believes his possible ultimate acquisition of the big, new Eagle plant on the River Rouge, southwest of Detroit, may tower above all other phases of the entire Eagle-boat situation.

When Ford last winter undertook to build the Eagles, and incidentally revolutionize shipbuilding practice, the Navy agreed to advance funds for the construction of the plant. And it has done so, for the testimony of high naval officers before congressional committees is to the effect that Henry Ford has not put one penny of his own money into that 14-acre plant, while the Navy has put about $3,500,000. It was quite obvious that with the termination of the Eagle contract the plant would be of no use whatsoever to the Navy. The site, owned by Ford, would be of no use to him with a Government-owned building on it, and vice versa. So provision for the future status of this $3,500,000 plant was made in the Ford Motor Co.'s contract with the Navy. Clause 20 reads:

DETAILS OF APPRAISALS.

"Upon the completion of all the work under this contract, the compensation board shall appraise the then value to the contractor of the building, building slips, plant, and other facilities, the property of the United States and located in or upon the contractor's works. Such appraisals shall be made in two separate parts, the first including all buildings, building slips, and appurtenances not susceptible of removal without destruction; the second including plant and other facilities which are readily removable. In its appraisals the compensation board shall take account of the original costs as shown by the inventories herein provided for, and the costs in a normal material and labor market, and all the circumstances, such as the use made of the buildings, building slips, and nonremovable parts, and of the plant and other facilities during the life of the contract, the condition of business generally, the desirability to the contractor of the additional property and plant, the amount of depreciation due to wear and tear, and the replacement value at market prices at the time of appraisal. The department will furnish the contractor with copies of the appraisals upon completion. If the contractor shall accept such appraisals, or either of them, it shall repay to the United States such appraisal value under such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy; but if the contractor shall refuse to pay the amount of the appraisals, or either of them, the department shall have the right to enter upon the contractor's works and remove such parts as shall not have been accepted as are readily removable and to wreck such parts as are not susceptible of removal for their salvage value."

MAY GET EXCELLENT PLANT.

All of which means, Detroit believes, that when Henry Ford ceases building Eagles he will come into possession of a fine, large manufacturing plant, only one year or so old, 350 by 1,700 feet, covering about 14 acres, in close proximity to his proposed blast furnace and steel works development, at his own price. It is obvious, it is pointed out, that Ford will not take over the Eagle plant unless the price is "right," and the Navy is likely to be willing to accept even a fraction of a percentage of its cost or value rather than sustain an actual loss in wrecking it and removing the material. Ford has publicly stated: "As soon as we get through building Eagle boats for the Navy, I contemplate building a lot of canal barges." This is evidence that he does look forward to acquiring the Navy-built Eagle plant. Practically every adverse condition that would have a bearing upon the appraised price is met in this clause of the contract. it is believed, and Ford's advent as a canal-barge or tractor builder on the banks of the River Rouge may be just as propitious as his disposition in regard to the price of the plant dictates.

As regards payment for completed Eagles, the Ford Motor Co. contract is believed equally favorable to the contractor. Clause 11 of the contract reads:

"On completion of the trials above mentioned and when each vessel is substantially completed, except minor items of work that may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be left unfinished, the vessel shall be delivered, and shall thereupon be conditionally accepted, and the department shall take possession of the vessel and shall be responsible for the safety thereof, and payment of all money due under this contract shall be made, subject, however, to a special reserve therefrom of $1,000, as provided for hereinafter."

ONLY $1,000 HELD BACK.

This sum of $1,000, the contract stipulates, shall be held for six months. Further along in the clause the contract states: "The fixed sum for profit shall be payable as follows: Ten thousand dollars shall be payable on each vessel as and when such vessel is half completed as certified by the inspectors, $9,000 shall be payable when such vessel is preliminarily accepted, and the remaining $1,000 to complete the $20,000 profit payable on each vessel shall be held to constitute the special reserve provided for under the eleventh clause of this contract. Such payments for profit shall be payable on the monthly bills of actual cost when and as accrued."

Such is the financial arrangement under which the Ford Motor Co., of which Henry Ford is founder, president, and principal owner, undertook to build submarine-chasing Eagles for the United States Government. As German submarines were seeking to attack American troop ships, Henry Ford was declaring, in a signed magazine article, "Everything we are making for the Government will be made without profit." And under the contract which one of his vice presidents negotiated with the Navy, his company does not even have to wait until it turns over its product to the Government. It gets half of its $20,000 profit when the Eagles are only half completed and $9,000 more when the boats are turned over to the Navy. When an Eagle steams away from the River Rouge, accepted by the Navy, Henry Ford has $19,000 of his $20,000 profit in the bank, and the Government has $1,000 to fall back on in case a structural defect crops out on a vessel that cost approximately $400,000, so far as the Ford Motor Co.'s efforts are concerned. Henry Ford's self-styled war-work philanthropy does not prevent his company from compelling the Government to be a cash customer; his terms are cash in advance.

Elsewhere in the contract it is stated that the contractor's collective liability "for breach of guaranties and agreements as to material, workmanship, and performance contained anywhere in this contract shall be limited to $1,000 on each vessel, and the deductions therefor shall not in the aggregate exceed this amount." Thus the Ford Motor Co.'s liability on a $400,000 boat is placed at $1,000—one-fourth of 1 per cent of its hull and machinery cost.

In his contract with the Navy Henry Ford agreed to "use every endeavor to deliver the first of said vessels within five months of the date of this contract, 10 boats within one month thereafter, 20 boats within the next following month, and 25 boats a month thereafter." With the contract dated March 1, 1918, this called for the first vessel by August 1, 10 by September 1, 20 in September, and 25 a month, or 1 a day, each month thereafter. Actually, 7 Eagles had been completed by the first week of November, and of these 7 which were dispatched to the Atlantic before the St. Lawrence froze up, 6 were turned over in a far from complete condition. This is actual performance contrasted with contract, and, Detroit believes, stamps the Ford Motor Co. as the only big automotive interest of the great number there to fall down seriously in its war work.

Without the advance of one dollar from the Government, John F. and Horace E. Dodge erected a huge steel and concrete factory, 600 by 800 feet, costing approximately $10,000,000, in which they manufactured the intricate recoil mechanisms for the 155-millimeter French howitzers and the 155-millimeter Filloux rifles at a rate never before approximated in the United States.

BUILT LIBERTY MOTORS.

The Lelands, Henry M. and his son, founded the great Lincoln Motor Co., which built Liberty motors. Fisher Body and Packard both did notable aircraft work. Henry Ford's Highland Park plant did commendable work on Liberty motors, ambulances, and tractors, but when his engineers attempted 204-foot ships, tiny in size as Navy craft go, they laid the fatal last straw upon the back of the organization that boasts it can develop films in rain water, can design a hospital far superior to the most expert physicians and surgeons, and proclaims it is the seventh heaven of all industrial efficiency and adaptability.

Detroit, his home city, looks upon whatever errors Henry Ford may be charged with as errors of omission. Despite the apparent wide gap between theory and practice as applied to his profits, Detroit believes he acted in good faith when he undertook to build the Eagles. The fact that he failed to turn out the boats as speedily as he planned is laid at the door of a lack of appreciation of the original magnitude of his task, the normal difficulties encountered in shipbuilding, and inability of his organization to adapt itself. The one big error of the entire matter, as Detroit sees it, is the one of commission on the part of the Navy in continuing the life of the contract for even the limited number of 60 Eagles.

The Eagles were designed solely for antisubmarine work, something the signing of the armistice disposed of. That such boats as the Eagles are of doubtful value as auxiliary craft, especially from cost of operation and maintenance, the Navy Department itself concedes. Whether such a craft, with a maximum draft of 8 feet and mounting two 4-inch and one 3-inch gun at a height of 20 feet and more above the water line, is really seaworthy has not yet been determined. The specially designed, Ford-built turbines have not been put to a real test as yet. All around, the Eagle type is of doubtful value, and as Rear Admiral Ralph Earle, Chief of Ordnance, for one, has stated publicly, the Navy in peace time would not consider building such craft. Henry Ford's finances are supposed to be sufficiently deep to cushion whatever shock would come from canceling the contract forthwith, a contingency provided for.

USES LABOR AND STEEL.

And still the Navy insists upon adhering to a project that will ultimately cost it more than $50,000,000, with no adequate return in sight, and insists upon using valuable steel and labor on 100 per cent war work long after the war has ended—where England reduced war work to a minimum the day the armistice was signed. It insists on depleting the Treasury at the very time the country faces its most serious financial crisis and requires the saving of every cent possible. For ships, guns, anything that would aid in the prosecution of the war Great Lakes business interests stand willing to be taxed to the last dollar. But for the Navy to continue the construction of war-designed Eagle boats in peace time, especially in the light of the $6,000,000,000 revenue bill pending, is beyond all understanding, these interests declare.

By way of "keeping books" on the Eagles, had the Navy Department done as Great Lakes industrial interests believe it should have done, and ordered work stopped on the Eagles November 12, as it could have done, the Navy would have had to pay:

For 7 completed Eagle boats, including hull and machinery, ordnance, profit, and alterations, approximately $550,000 each, or a total of $3,850,000;

For 24 Eagles, ranging from 40 to 75 per cent completed, actual cost plus 10 per cent profit; and

For material already worked up and equipment built or building for 69 Eagles, actual cost plus 10 per cent profit.

WHAT NAVY CONTEMPLATES.

But by continuing work on 60 Eagles and dropping only 40 the Navy faces this outlay:

For 60 completed Eagles, including hull and machinery, ordnance, and profit, approximately $550,000 each, or a total of $33,000,000; and

For material already worked up and equipment built or building for 40 Eagles, actual cost plus 10 per cent profit.

Just what the Navy could have saved for income-tax payers, bond and war stamp buyers by abandoning the Eagle program, paying Henry Ford his cost plus 10 per cent on all boats and equipment partially built and machinery completed or in process of manufacture, is next to impossible to determine. Probably the nearest approach to an estimate would be the difference between 7 complete Eagles and 60, or $29,000,000, roughly.

Suffice it to say that the $33,000,000 the Navy will pay for the 60 Eagles complete is but the first cost. The cost plus 10 per cent on the remaining 40 undoubtedly will run up to $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. At $9,000 a year, an Eagle, for maintenance of machinery, as estimated by Rear Admiral Robert S. Griffin, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, this one item alone would mount up to $540,000 a year for the 60. In addition would be the cost of operation, the pay roll for 60 crews of 7 officers and 68 men each, and other expenses incidental to operation.

Fifty million dollars and more, then, including a round million and a half for their profit-decrying builder, is what Secretary Daniels purposes to pay for 60 fledgling and 40 still-hatched Eagles.

In scanning appropriations for the Navy Department, and more especially its proposed building program, the House Committee on Naval Affairs and its Subcommittee on Appropriations recently scratched the surface of the Ford Eagle case. By their own statements high officials of the department condemn the department's stand in insisting on the construction of 60 Eagles, or $33,000,000 worth.

No room is left for hiding behind words in the testimony of Rear Admiral Ralph Earle, Chief of Ordnance, before the committee. Quizzed by members of the committee, he said, according to the official record:

Mr. KELLEY. Admiral, if these boats had not been started and if no contract had been given, would you make a new contract now for 100 boats of this type?

Admiral EARLE. You mean with no war on, sir?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; with the war over.

Admiral EARLE. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. You would not make it?

Admiral EARLE. No, sir.

Much the same stand was taken by Rear Admiral David W. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. Eagle boats are approximately the same size as the old, small type of destroyers, and the department now would not consider building such vessels, he pointed out. His testimony before the subcommittee was as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. Will you please tell me the purpose for which we will use these boats when the war is over—100 of these small boats?

Admiral TAYLOR. They are not such small boats. They are 500 tons, or practically 500 tons, displacement.

Mr. BUTLER. The size of the small destroyers which were put out?

Admiral TAYLOR. About the size of the older destroyers.

Mr. BUTLER. We do not build any more of them?

Admiral TAYLOR. No; we are building larger destroyers, but we have been using the small ones right along.

Mr. BUTLER. But, Admiral Taylor, we would not provide for any more small destroyers, would we?

Admiral TAYLOR. Hardly.

What is even more startling is that Navy officials frankly say they don't know why the department wants Eagle boats now that their submarine enemies are safely interned. Rear Admiral Robert S. Griffin, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, stated before the committee:

Mr. BROWNING. What do you want with the Eagle boats?

Admiral GRIFFIN. They are built for service against the submarines.

Mr. BROWNING. I understand; but what do you want with the balance?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I do not know.

Indicative of the feeling among Congressmen that the Eagle boat program should have been cut short with the ending of the war and millions of dollars saved is the following statement from the committee's official record:

Mr. KELLEY. I can well understand how the Government might feel under obligation to save contractors from any harm, but if this is a type of boat that we would not ordinarily order, it would almost seem as though we ought to settle with Mr. Ford and not build them.

This at once precipitated queries as to the financial burden thrust upon Ford:

Mr. BROWNING. What expense did Mr. Ford go to in changing his plant to build these boats?

Admiral EARLE. Mr. Ford had no expense whatever in connection with them.

Mr. BROWNING. Do you mean there was no expense in changing the factory at all?

Admiral EARLE. No, sir; not to him.

Mr. BROWNING. Did the Government incur the expense?

Admiral EARLE. The Government did it all.

Mr. BROWNING. What did it cost?

Admiral EARLE. I have never seen that figure. The only reason, Mr. Butler, I knew that we were going to finish these boats was that in making up my revised estimates to submit to you I had to find out whether these boats were going to be finished or not, in order to keep that money in the ordnance estimates.

Mr. KELLEY. My question was simply asked to find out the admiral's personal opinion about the desirability of finishing 100 boats of this type.

Mr. BUTLER. And the admiral said to you that if he had it to do over again in peace time he would not order these boats.

Admiral EARLE. The destroyer is better and in every way more economical, I believe, for the Government to build.

That the Eagle boats are quite slow in comparison with other craft of a like nature the Navy now is building is shown by the following statement by Admiral Griffin:

Mr. KELLEY. What is the difference between these boats in construction and gunboats?

Admiral GRIFFIN. They are much lighter and carry a lighter battery.

Mr. KELLEY. These are lighter?

Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir; and their speed is more like that of a torpedo boat.

Mr. KELLEY. What is the speed?

Admiral GRIFFIN. About 18.5 knots.

Mr. KELLEY. What is the speed of the oldest destroyers?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I think they were intended for 28 knots.

Mr. KELLEY. These are very slow boats?

Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir; compared with those we are now building.

So far as the Government is concerned the $3,500,000 and more it has put into the Ford Eagle plant on the River Rouge is a total loss. This Admiral Griffin made clear, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. Can you recall what disposition is to be made of this factory after the war is over?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I do not remember that. Most of the contracts that we have made—I think nearly all of them—are subject to an appraisal, after the completion of the contract, to be taken over by the contractor. I do not know whether that is in this one or not.

Mr. BUTLER. This plant will not be of a dollar's use to the Government after the boats are built, unless we build others?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I suppose not.

Mr. BUTLER. And we will lose everything?

Admiral GRIFFIN. We had to get somebody to build the boats. These boats were considered necessary to carry on the war, and the facilities for building them did not exist, and, as in a number of other cases, we had to build a plant for them.

Orders for 40 of the first 100 Eagles finally were canceled, but the machinery for the 40 built or building is good only for scrap. This is light on the contention of some Great Lakes shipbuilders that the Eagles should have been built as a unit for each boat instead of en bloc. In this connection Admiral Griffin has stated:

Mr. KELLEY. These engines which are being constructed for the Ford boats, will they be of value for other craft?

Admiral GRIFFIN. No. We would have to build the craft for them. That would be rather expensive.

Mr. KELLEY. You could not use the engines for any other boats?

Admiral GRIFFIN. No, sir.

Mr. BROWNING. And you could not use them for the tugs that you were speaking of—the mine sweepers?

Admiral GRIFFIN. No, sir.

On this subject Admiral Taylor also has added his opinion:

Admiral TAYLOR. * * * Hull material has been delivered practically entirely for all of the 112 boats, although there are a few items still remaining to be delivered on the last 12. So that the fabrication is practically three-quarters done.

Mr. BUTLER. What do you mean by "fabrication"?

Admiral TAYLOR. The working up of the material for the hulls in the ships, getting the plates, etc., ready to be assembled.

Mr. BUTLER. Could you use that material for any other purpose?

Admiral TAYLOR. It could be sold for scrap, but it has very little value for anything else. The plates come cut to shape and size, and when they are fabricated they have the holes punched in them, which practically destroys their value for any other purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. How about the engines for the boats?

Admiral TAYLOR. They might be put in——

Mr. BUTLER (interposing). Could anybody else use them for any purpose?

Admiral TAYLOR. Hardly, as they stand. These engines are specially built for these boats. They are geared down to the desired revolutions of the propeller of the boat.

To climax Congress's knowledge of the Eagle boats is the outright assertion of Admiral Griffin, in charge of the important Bureau of Steam Engineering, that it would be much cheaper to end construction immediately and pay Henry Ford his actual cost and 10 per cent profit on the completed boats than it will be to go through even with 60 Eagles and pay watchmen to stand guard over them. Not until the next war will the Eagles be needed, declared the admiral when quizzed by the committee:

Mr. BUTLER. If not kept in commission, they will rot out?

Admiral GRIFFIN. They will go to waste quickly.

Mr. BUTLER. And it will cost us money to keep them in commission?

Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not cheaper for us to let them go?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I doubt that. The state of completion is such that I doubt very much if we would save much by cutting off the contract.

Mr. BROWNING. The state of the Eagle boats?

Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir. All of that material is on hand, practically fabricated; the boilers are well along, and the machinery generally is ahead of the hulls.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not cheaper to stop and pay what we owe than it is to go ahead and complete these boats and tie them up somewhere and pay men to watch them?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I suppose it is.

Mr. BUTLER. We will not have any charge upon the Treasury hereafter if we stop these boats and pay the bill; we are through?

Admiral GRIFFIN. There will be no further expenditure.

Mr. BUTLER. If we are to have peace, we do not need the 112 Eagle boats?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I suppose not.

Mr. BUTLER. We will not need them until the next war?

Admiral GRIFFIN. No, sir.

WHAT OFFICIALS THINK OF EAGLES.

Asked if the $3,500,000 Ford Eagle plant will be of not a dollar's use to the Government after the boats are built, Rear Admiral Griffin, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, answered, "I suppose not."

To the question, "If these boats had not been started and no contract given, would you make a new contract for 100 boats of this type?" Rear Admiral Earle, Chief of Ordnance, replied, "No, sir."

Questioned whether Henry Ford went to any expense to build the Eagle boats, Admiral Earle said, "The Government did it all."

Said Congressman KELLEY, of the House Committee on Naval Affairs: "It would almost seem as though we ought to settle with Mr. Ford and not build them."

NAVY KEPT CONVICTS OFF EAGLES.

Henry Ford's trust in ex-convicts, pardoned criminals, workhouse and stone-pile labor, and the like evidently is not shared by the Navy Department. The Ford Motor Co.'s contract with the Navy Department specifically says:

"In the performance of this contract no person shall be employed that is under sentence of imprisonment at hard labor."

Prison stripes were not meant to be the camouflage design of Eagle boats!

[From the Daily Iron Trade and Metal Market Report, Cleveland, Ohio, Dec. 31, 1918.]

EAGLE CONTRACT CALLED FAULTY—HENRY FORD'S PROFIT ASSURED, WITH PRACTICALLY NO SAFEGUARD FOR GOVERNMENT AGAINST EXCESSIVE CONSTRUCTION COSTS—IS HELD TO BE WASTEFUL—NAVAL OFFICERS ADMIT "BOGEY" COST OF $275,000 WAS NEVER EXPECTED TO BE MET—WHAT OFFICERS THINK OF FORD MOTOR CO.—ELEMENTS OF COST GIVEN—SCHEDULE SHOWS WHAT FORD WAS TO BILL NAVY AS ACTUAL EXPENSES INCURRED AT $3,500,000 RIVER ROGUE PLANT.

Government contracts such as the Navy Department negotiated with the Ford Motor Co. for the construction of the Eagle boats do not properly conserve the public interest, because their fixed-profit provisions fail to penalize for excessive costs.

This is the opinion of a lawyer, known equally well in Washington, New York, and Cleveland, who is regarded as a most astute man. Years of experience in contracting have convinced him of the folly of entering into such pacts.

"Henry Ford's Eagle contract assures him a profit of $20,000 a boat utterly regardless of what the boats cost," declares this man. "Further, it is stipulated that in case the actual cost of an Eagle falls below $275,000 Ford is to share 25 per cent of the saving.

NO CHECK ON EXTRAVAGANCE.

"On the face of it such a contract is not mutual. The contractor is guaranteed a premium for economy, but the Government is not protected if the contractor exceeds the estimate. Consider this in the light that at all times it was not believed the Eagles could be built for as little as $275,000.

"Such contracts are wasteful of the Government's money. Not alone in the Ford Eagle case, but in a great many others the facts have been that the Government put up or paid for the plant, is paying the contractor a guaranteed profit regardless of the cost, at the end the contractor will take over the plant dirt cheap and what is as probably most valuable—he will have acquired invaluable experience in a new line of work."

WHAT TAYLOR SAID.

Applying this directly in the case of Henry Ford's Eagles, statements by Rear Admiral David W. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, are most enlightening. This question was put to the admiral:

"In regard to these Eagle boats, you said that Mr. Ford had estimated that he could build them for $275,000 apiece, and you think, as I take it, that they will probably cost $400,000. There is a difference of $125,000. What, in your opinion, caused that serious mistake of judgment?"

To this Admiral Taylor replied:

"I do not think the Ford people who made this figure had had sufficient experience to estimate the cost. They had no experience in shipbuilding. The 'bogey' cost of $275,000 inserted in the contract was not a binding estimate in any way."

Admiral Taylor has further stated that "I think if the cost of the hull and machinery comes below $400,000 it will be a very creditable performance."

ESTIMATE WAY LOW.

What is held up as a spur to Henry Ford to build the Eagles as cheaply as possible on the face of it is not worth the paper it is written on apparently, for the very testimony of a high naval officer is that to build them for $125,000 more than the "bogey" cost would be a "very creditable performance."

And the Ford Motor Co., a company that "had no experience in shipbuilding," one that did not have "sufficient experience to estimate the cost" was the Navy's choice of a builder for 112 Eagles costing $550,000 complete, or $61,600,000 worth of boats. At the Navy's request this company is continuing to build 60 Eagles, at a cost of $33,000,000, although they have never been actually tried out, in the face of the admission of the Navy Department itself that the Eagles will not be needed "until the next war."

SCHEDULE SHOWS COSTS.

Attached to the body of the Ford Motor Co.'s contract with the Navy Department is the following schedule of the elements of actual cost for which Henry Ford is to be paid. It is noted that "the following schedule shall be considered as an amplification of the definitions of cost contained in this contract, but shall not be construed as an exhaustive enumeration of the elements of actual cost."

A. OVERHEAD.

The elements defined below shall be included under overhead:

1. Indirect material: This shall include such materials as are used in the process of manufacture, but either do not enter into the product or else enter it in such manner as not to be conveniently chargeable to any particular produce.

2. Packing and packing supplies: This shall include boxes, lumber, nails, containers, strapping, and miscellaneous packing supplies, and the labor used in connection with the work of packing.

3. Indirect labor: This shall include labor not expended directly on the product, but which is nevertheless required to be performed in connection with the manufacture of the product. Labor of packing shall be included hereunder. Examples: Repairing, handling, trucking, sweeping, etc.

4. Experimental work: Only experimental work directly necessary in connection with the contract and not otherwise expressly paid for shall be includable, except small residual expenses for general experimentation which it is impracticable to allocate distinctly.

5. Repairs: Includable here are costs for such repairs only as are currently made to provide for ordinary regular upkeep of plant, which costs are a usual and fairly consistent annual charge.

6. Administrative expenses: Only that portion of general administrative expense which is applicable to Government work may be included hereunder. Such applicability, rather than the character of the service received for these expenses, shall constitute the test of inclusion hereunder.

7. Employees' welfare: Includable under this element are the following items:

(a) Wages paid employees while absent on account of sickness.

(b) Vacation allowances to wage earners.

(c) Net cost of operation and maintaining plant hospitals, expenditures for hospitals and other organizations to cover definite benefits to employees, and expenses for medicines and supplies for aid to the injured.

(d) Payments according to a definite pension plan to disabled and veteran employees or their families not covered by liability insurance or other items herein mentioned.

(e) Net cost of operating the contractor's restaurants.

(f) Expenses in connection with other general forms of employees' welfare work.

8. Taxes: Tax accruals during the period of the contract shall be included in overhead, except that Federal income, Federal excess or war profits taxes, and Federal taxes of the same economic character shall not be included in cost.

9. Insurance: Accrued insurance premiums on the contractor's property, on his interest in others' property used in connection with the contract, and for liability insurance (whether payable to insurance companies, State compensation boards, or under independent insurance plans not materially exceeding in cost the first two methods mentioned) shall be includable hereunder. Insurance on the vessels shall be charged to the vessels.

10. Rent: Rental payments made by the contractor shall be analyzed between (a) interest on investment and (b) repairs, depreciation, insurance, taxes, maintenance, and service expense. Only that portion covering items includable under (b) shall be allowed in actual cost.

11. House service and power plant: Includable hereunder are the proper proportions of the expense of keeping the buildings of the contractor, used in connection with the contract, cleaned, heated, lighted, supplied with elevator and other services necessary to render the same a fit place to work in, and also the proper proportion of the power plant operating expenses.

12. Excluded elements: Interest, advertising, collection expense, credit losses, and financing costs shall not be included in overhead or elsewhere.

B. DEPRECIATION.

1. Repairs and alterations of a general nature which are necessary only at intervals of more than a year, or replacements and unusual repairs which would involve a significant increase in expenses shall not be considered as expense, but shall apply against the reserve established for depreciation.

2. Jigs, etc.: Small tools, jigs, dies, patterns, machine-tool fixtures, and other appliances of the same general nature, when exclusively provided and adapted for making the work herein contracted for, shall be depreciated 100 per cent or charged to the cost of the vessels.

C. ELEMENTS CAPABLE OF ALTERNATIVE TREATMENT.

1. Freight, cartage, and express (inward), etc.: Where the inclusion of the above in direct material costs is impracticable they may be included in overhead. Same principle shall apply in case of duties and import expenses.

2. Wastage and corrective labor: In addition to normal wastage, scrap, and collective labor under usual manufacturing conditions, all excessive wastage, scrap, and corrective labor incident to work under existing abnormal conditions which could not have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care and good faith shall be included in actual cost, either with direct material or direct labor or under overhead.

3. Discounts: Trade discounts and discounts for prompt payment, unless the contractor, though exercising reasonable care and business skill shall have been unable to take the same, shall not be included in the amounts to which the contractor is entitled to be reimbursed and shall either be deducted from material costs or eliminated in such manner as the compensation board may direct.

D. ROYALTY.

Any royalty or payment that the contractor may be obliged to assume or pay for the use of any patent rights in connection with the production of articles contracted for shall be included in actual cost.

E. MISCELLANEOUS CREDITS TO COST.

Miscellaneous items of revenue accruing to the contractor in connection with the present contract shall be credited to actual cost.

F. RULES AND PRINCIPLES FOR COMPUTING AMOUNTS ALLOWABLE FOR COST ELEMENTS.

1. Salaries and wages: Neither excessive salaries nor excessive compensation of any kind shall be allowed.

2. Scrap and waste credits: The salvage value of scrap and waste shall be deducted, either from material cost or from overhead.

3. Direct material costs: In determining direct material costs, actual prices paid shall be used; where this is impracticable, use fair average prices. In case the material used shall be from contractor's stores purchased prior to contract apply the same principles.

4. Depreciation: The rate and amount of depreciation allowed shall be arrived at by a consideration of the following factors:

(a) Nature, construction, and condition of buildings and equipment.
(b) Deterioration of plant and machinery due to wear and tear.
(c) Amount spent for maintenance in the way of repairs and renewals.
(d) The invention of new methods or new machines which may or may not entirely replace the old ones.
(e) Permanency of business and likelihood of increase or decrease in the same.
(f) Amounts previously written off for depreciation.
(g) Other factors, such as peculiar and excessive uses of machines, rate of production, idleness of plant.

ARTICLE BY ERVING WINSLOW.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a very short note of Mr. Erving Winslow, of the city of Boston, State of Massachusetts, together with a one-page article written by him to one of the papers of that State, entitled "Anarchy." I ask it because it is, in part, an answer to certain matter which has been inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST LEAGUE,
New Haven, Conn., January 4, 1919.

The Hon. J. S. WILLIAMS.

DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: Loyal to the President in my humble way, as you are in your great office, I want to ask you to have this condensed epitome printed in the RECORD, as your California colleague has caused to be done with Russian matter which interests him. If you can not, please put your frank upon envelope for return, as I have no other copy.

Wishing you health and peace for the New Year,
I am, faithfully, yours,

ERVING WINSLOW.

ANARCHY.

NEW HAVEN, January 2, 1919.

There is certainly ground for much apprehension of "old-fashioned," selfishly inspired adjustments dictated by the big nations on top to weaker ones at their mercy. But while hydra-headed Scylla may swoop down from above and hinder the wayfarer's progress to his goal, the whirlpool of Charybdis yawns below, to engulph its victoms in the maelstrom from which the high gods can not rescue them.

Anarchy is the most serious menace of the day, though so little mentioned. It may be an instinctive feeling that its mention is going to encourage it which induces as a measure of safety such an "ostrich policy." But the "internationale" has its own propaganda, wireless and underground, and, smoldering, spreads like a forest fire. We are told that the use of force to suppress it is only going to fan it into a hot flame. There is one obvious weapon against it which is in the hands of America to-day. It is the relief of that suffering for necessities which supplies now the fuel. While this would win away that peasantry who have found that their present leaders have failed to fulfill their promises, it would enable the representatives of an "orderly democracy" to impress its example on the proletariat. It is among the people of the great country which was such a heroic sufferer in the war against a common enemy that this double mission should be undertaken, challenging not nor recognizing any "government." The peasantry themselves would soon furnish a bulwark against any interference, which might be avoided at first by a small protective force. If the former subjects of the German Emperor seek to evade their responsibility by taking up the "Soviet" principles, they can not share in such consideration due the misled Russian people. On the contrary, the forces of the United States may have to be employed against those who, under whatever name, must remain a conquered enemy, held to solidarity as such, for the repayments and restitutions demanded. Our action as outlined to Russia would also prove to the anarchistic, restless spirit among ourselves and in the allied countries that democracy means brotherhood, cooperation, opportunity.

The equality of the powers of the great States is important, but the paramount issue to be declared at the council is the "Wilsonian" issue—the establishment of our democracy, which is that of the British Empire, containing as it does a regenerative power—and the denunciation of the heresy of the terror as it exists and threatens to expand, and of the hereslarchs among the civilized nations who would foment it in class warfare.

ERVING WINSLOW.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 635) thereon.

SITES FOR MILITARY HOSPITALS.

Mr. HARDWICK. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 386, submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on December 14, 1918, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the selection and acquisition of sites for military hospitals, and contracts and expenditures for the repair, acquisition, and construction of such hospitals; also what additional hospital facilities are required and what existing public buildings, if any, are available for use as hospitals.

ALMA HARRIS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, from the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 4240) for the relief of Alma Harris, and I submit a report (No. 634) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

I can state to the Senate just what the report is. There was an entrywoman in southern New Mexico who made an entry upon public land and was prevented from residing upon the land by reason of the unlawful incursions of the people from old Mexico. This matter was favorably recommended by the Department of the Interior and was incorporated in an omnibus bill which has already passed the Senate, but a bill has passed the House giving relief in this special case, and I ask the passage of the bill by the Senate so as to consummate the relief which has been asked for and recommended by the Department of the Interior.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there was so much confusion in the Chamber at the time the Senator made the statement in regard to this bill that I was unable to hear the facts; but I am constitutionally opposed to authorization to issue patents for lands without compliance with the law, and I should like to ask the Senator upon what grounds this request is being made.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The facts in the case are stated fully in a letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the House. This entrywoman was driven from the land by people from old Mexico during the rebellion down there, and it was only because of the rebellion in Mexico that this entrywoman was prevented from actually residing upon the land during the period required by the law. There is no question about the facts in the matter. She went upon the land and did everything to comply with the law until she was driven off—actually driven out of her home by bandits from old Mexico. The Secretary of the Interior so reports, and recommends the passage of this bill. I will state to the Senator that this relief was embodied in an omnibus bill which has already passed the Senate and is now in the House; but the House passed a bill giving specific relief in this case, and I am simply asking the Senate to do in this form what it has already done in another bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to Alma Harris for the southeast quarter section 12, township 29 south, range 7 west, New Mexico principal meridian, in the Las Cruces land district, New Mexico, upon payment of the lawful purchase price of said land, without further proof of compliance with law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROCK RIVER BRIDGE, WIS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 5192) for the construction of a bridge across Rock River at or near Jackson Street, in the city of Janesville, Wis., and I submit a report

(No. 633) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to offer just a formal amendment to the bill, to correct a description of the location of the bridge.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 7, before the word "Jackson," insert the word "South," and in the same line, after the word "Janesville," strike out the words "crosses the" and insert "connects with."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SMOOT. By the Committee on Appropriations I am directed to report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 199) for relief in Alaska. As this is an emergency matter, I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That to enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under his direction, with the advice and cooperation of the Public Health Service, to combat the influenza in Alaska and to afford relief to the indigent natives thereof, including expenses already incurred for this purpose, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the joint resolution is taken up for consideration I should like to know something about how it is expected to reach the situation and how much of this $100,000 will ever get to its destination by reason of the conditions which surround the situation. I should like to know how we are to get into the different parts of Alaska at this time and what are the details of the methods by which this scheme is to be effected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the governor of Alaska was before the committee on yesterday, when he outlined the serious situation existing in Alaska not only among the white people but among the Indians as well, on account of the prevalence of the influenza, which has been raging there for some time. In some places, it was testified to by the governor, that as high as 50 per cent of the Indians have died from the effects of the influenza.

The revenues of Alaska are very limited, indeed, and the governor feels that the only way that this dread disease can be successfully coped with is by assistance from the Federal Government. The governor asked for $200,000.

Mr. BORAH. I know generally the situation which prevails in Alaska and its seriousness, but I want to know something about the method by which it is proposed to deal with the matter. How is it proposed to take hold of it, and who is going to administer this fund? It is easy to appropriate, but I should like to know something of its use.

Mr. SMOOT. The fund is to be administered by the Secretary of the Interior with the assistance of the Public Health Service. They will, of course, direct physicians who are now in Alaska to go to different parts of Alaska and to do everything possible to overcome this dread disease.

I desire to say to the Senator from Idaho that a great deal of this money will be used for help particularly in the way of food, clothing, medical assistance, and medicine for the Indians.

I desire to say also that in one district of Alaska there are now 90 motherless and fatherless children, made orphans through the death of their parents from influenza. Those orphans have been provided for, the governor of the Territory having made a contract that they shall be taken care of at $10 per month per capita. The governor has already authorized expenditures to the amount of $107,000. He also testified that even to carry on the work which had been undertaken it will take another $50,000, or at least $43,000 more, to provide funds for that purpose until the time of the meeting of the Territorial legislature.

It is for this reason, Mr. President, that the committee voted that the joint resolution should be favorably reported, reduced, however, to the amount of $100,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand perfectly the necessity of doing this work; but Congress is in the habit of voting large sums of money here without any check or any knowledge of the plan by which that money is to be expended. The result is that we get very little effect from our efforts to accomplish anything along this line.

As an illustration, Mr. President, while I am on my feet, I desire to say that the President sent a message here a few days ago asking us to appropriate $100,000,000 with which to feed the people of Europe. If there is no more information as to where that money is going and how it is going to be expended than is incorporated in the President's message, I for one shall not vote for any such appropriation. We are entitled to know to whom that appropriation is going, what particular people in Europe are to be fed, and, particularly, the plans and methods by which it is proposed to take care of the situation. I shall not myself vote to simply turn over $100,000,000 to be administered by the food department as it has administered food affairs in this country. I want it, therefore, to be understood that when the Appropriations Committee brings in legislation for the appropriation of this $100,000,000 that it must bring in detailed facts as to how the money is to be expended and where it is going. I want security for its repayment, and I want to know if our associates, England and France, are going to cooperate. I want, also, some one made responsible, who will account in detail as to how the money is expended. If we are going to feed Europe, which I do not admit, we must do it in a business way, for the American taxpayer has about reached his limit.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Idaho, I desire to say that I am positive that the Appropriations Committee of the Senate is not going to report in favor of the appropriation of $100,000,000 for the feeding of the starving people of Europe unless they do have more information than they have in their possession to-day. I will assure the Senator from Idaho of that fact.

Mr. BORAH. There is a vast amount of comfort in that assurance.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say in relation to the $100,000 that is proposed to be appropriated for Alaska that the governor of Alaska gave a description of how the $107,000 heretofore expended had been apportioned. In the Nome district, I think, there was apportioned about $20,000; in the smaller districts in Alaska there had been apportioned in some $2,000, in others $3,000, and in others $5,000. The $107,000 covered the amount of the expenditures up to the time that the governor had received the last report.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. The sum of $1,000,000 has heretofore been appropriated for the suppression of the influenza. Has the Senator from Utah any statement as to what disposition was made of that money and whether any of that sum remains available for expenditure in Alaska?

Mr. SMOOT. The $1,000,000 which was appropriated by Congress for the purpose to which the Senator from Virginia alludes has been expended with the exception of about $135,000. It is true that a part of that $1,000,000 went to Alaska.

Mr. SWANSON. How much of it went to Alaska?

Mr. SMOOT. Gen. Blue, of the Public Health Service, stated to the committee that he did not know just exactly the amount that had been sent to Alaska, but the amount sent there had been used for the purpose of paying physicians who had been sent into different parts of Alaska. He stated that he had not received the last report, and therefore could not say just what amount had been sent to Alaska.

Mr. SWANSON. About how much was it?

Mr. SMOOT. It was a very small percentage of the $865,000 already expended.

Mr. SWANSON. For what is it proposed to use this $100,000—to send physicians to Alaska?

Mr. SMOOT. It is to be used to furnish the necessaries of life, I will say to the Senator from Virginia, to Indians in certain parts of Alaska, and also to send medicine and physicians into affected districts and see what can be done to control the epidemic.

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Territorial government of Alaska any funds which can be used for this purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. No funds have been appropriated for the purpose. I want the Senate to understand the full conditions. The Territory of Alaska has about $600,000 in its treasury, or it had about that amount or a little more than that amount a year ago, and about the same amount to-day. The governor of Alaska stated that that $600,000 had been collected by taxation and is held in the treasury for the purpose of building roads and making improvements in different parts of Alaska, which are absolutely necessary.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, I should like to ask the Senator this question: If Congress should authorize the expenditure of $100,000 out of that fund in the treasury of Alaska for this purpose, could the money be made immediately available?

Mr. SMOOT. No; Congress could not do that, and the money could not be taken out of the treasury of Alaska until after the Territorial legislature meets in Alaska.

I will say to the Senator from Virginia that the $107,000 that has already been apportioned in Alaska has been so apportioned upon the responsibility of the governor. He has no authority by law to take such action, but we, of course, all know that the legislature, when it meets, will see that the governor is held harmless so far as any loss is concerned.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the Legislature of Alaska, without any authorization from Congress, could appropriate out of this $600,000 ample funds with which to take care of the situation?

Mr. SMOOT. The Legislature of Alaska can do that, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. The only question, then, is as to whether the sum shall be appropriated by the Federal Government or by the Territorial government of Alaska?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only question which is involved.

Mr. SWANSON. Is this money to be reimbursed under this joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. No, this is not reimbursable; it is a direct appropriation to Alaska.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator from Utah object to having it made reimbursable?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to state why I am in favor of this direct appropriation of $100,000. We all know the situation in Alaska. Nearly all of the public lands in Alaska have been withdrawn, and the principal source of taxation is the imposition of a tax upon the business interests of Alaska. In other words, of the million dollars collected by taxation in Alaska, half of it comes from the salmon packers alone. No taxes can be collected from the public land, and over 99 per cent of the lands of Alaska are public lands, and a great proportion of these lands are withdrawn from entry. Therefore Alaska is restricted in her power to collect taxes. That being the case, it seemed, at least to a majority of the committee, that in the face of such an epidemic as is now raging in Alaska—and the second outbreak is already on—it is about as little as could possibly be done to give Alaska $100,000 to assist in overcoming the epidemic.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator at that point that only one-fiftieth of 1 per cent of the territory of Alaska is in private ownership and subject to taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is absolutely true, Mr. President. Indeed, I hardly thought the amount in private ownership was that much.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KING. I did not hear all that the senior Senator from Utah said, but I wish to inquire whether or not this epidemic is raging among the Indians who are in tribal relations, who have a right to look to the Government for protection and whose interests the Government ought to care for? If any of them are Indians in tribal relations, there is some sort of obligation upon the Government to care for them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the governor of Alaska stated that 90 per cent of the cases of influenza were among the Indians. I wish to say to the Senator that I was surprised to learn that there are no Indians in Alaska who have had citizenship conferred upon them. They are not even as well off in that respect as many of the Indians within the continental boundaries of the United States, and it seems to me that $100,000—as I have heretofore said, $200,000 was asked for—ought to be expended by the Government to combat this dread disease. It is true that we appropriated a million dollars, as has already been stated, to combat the influenza epidemic generally, but very little of that million dollars found its way to Alaska.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah tell me the number of Indians in Alaska?

Mr. SMOOT. There are 27,000 Indians in Alaska, and there are only 20,000 white people there; in other words, there are only 47,000 souls in Alaska to-day. Six years ago there were 50,000 white people in Alaska, but within six years the white population of Alaska has decreased from 50,000 to 20,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This is due, Mr. President, to our policy started about 12 years ago with relation to reserving the lands and natural resources of Alaska.

Mr. BORAH. Not wholly, Mr. President; that is a very bad feature of it; but it will transpire in due time that that is not the sole reason for the depopulation of Alaska.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was going to make the same statement the Senator from Idaho has just made.

Mr. President, I do not know that there is anything more to say in regard to this matter. I think I have covered the situation pretty thoroughly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word. I am not going to try to amend the joint resolution. I think, however, that the provision it makes, upon the part of Congress, is very niggardly, in view of the situation in Alaska. There ought to be appropriated at least $150,000 to take care of the situation, but the committee has decided that $100,000 was all that it would recommend.

The conditions are simply deplorable. A large part of this money will go to taking care of homeless and orphaned children, made orphans by this dread disease. There may not so much of it go to actually combating the disease itself; but at one place, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has stated, one-half of the natives have died. That leaves many orphaned children, who will simply starve unless they are taken care of. The white people of that Territory ought not to have the burden imposed upon them of taking care of these Indians, who are really wards of the Government, any more than the people of a State should have the burden of taking care of the Indians within that State imposed upon them. This is not done in the case of the States. The Government takes care of Indians within their boundaries; we recognize them as wards of the National Government, as they are, and the Indians, the Aleuts, and other natives in Alaska are in the same way wards of the Government.

Of course it is very much more expensive to afford relief in that Territory than within the borders of the United States proper, and, as I have said, I think the amount provided is very niggardly. I am not, however, going to try to amend the joint resolution in the hope that we can put it through promptly and possibly get more somewhere else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5283) granting a pension to Edwin W. Gordon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 5284) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 5285) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 5287) to provide for the control, supervision, and operation of telegraph, telephone, marine cable, and radio systems; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH of South Carolina:

A bill (S. 5288) to provide transportation, storage, and marketing facilities for, and to regulate the commerce among the States in, live stock, meats, and other products derived from live stock or the slaughtering of live stock; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 5289) to amend paragraph 5 of section 5 of the United States cotton-futures act, approved August 11, 1916, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 5290) for the investigation and extermination of the European corn borer; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. SMITH of Georgia:

A bill (S. 5291) to repeal section 7 of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 5292) making it unnecessary to secure permits from the United States Shipping Board for the construction of ships in American shipyards for foreign account; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 5293) granting an increase of pension to Ephriam D. Edwards (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5294) granting an increase of pension to Joseph A. Truesdale (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 5295) donating captured cannon and cannon balls to the city of Orange, Tex.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 5296) for the suitable recognition of war workers who have during the existing war donated or virtually donated their services to the United States Government; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5297) for the naming of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 5298) granting a pension to Della J. Nash; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 5299) granting a pension to Jacob A. Booher; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 5300) providing for a reclamation project on the Strawberry River, Duchesne County, Utah, to be known as the Castle Peak reclamation project; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

A bill (S. 5301) to extend the franking privilege to the State Council of Defense of Utah; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 5302) granting a pension to Ella B. Kean (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 5303) to permit joining the United States of America as a party defendant in an action in Federal and State courts in certain actions affecting title to real property; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 5304) to authorize the Federal courts of the United States to render declaratory judgments; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 5305) to stimulate the production, sale, and distribution of live stock and live-stock products, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. GORE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 208) providing that one term of the United States District Court for the Eastern Judicial District of Oklahoma shall be held annually at Hugo, Okla.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for reading and reference to the Interstate Commerce Committee. In that connection I desire to say that it is in substance a bill which I introduced about a month ago. It contains some modifications, however, and I thought this was the best way in which to make them. I ask for its reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 5284) to amend section 10 of an act "to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

CABLE SERVICE.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I think, in fairness to myself, I ought to have an opportunity for about five minutes to explain the nature of the bill and why it has been introduced. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to read this bill. It is a bill to provide for the control, supervision, and operation of telegraph, telephone, marine cable, and radio systems.

The bill has not received by myself that consideration which I should wish to give to such a bill if it were to be reported for passage. In fact, I am not willing to say that I would give my support to all of the provisions of the bill. I should wish to hear from the Postmaster General and the various experts of the systems to be affected and representatives of the public before I could make up my mind definitely; but I thought, as the subject was before the Senate, it was well to introduce the bill so that it might receive the careful consideration of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Some provisions of the bill I have introduced by request, one of them which I should like to mention later.

The bill, in a general way, places all of the telegraph, telephone, cable, and radio systems under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I might say that they are already under the control of the commission; but this bill seeks to extend that control, so as to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix not only maximum but minimum rates, to control service, and to compel interchange of business and use of facilities. In other words, it extends the power of the commission over the service as well as the rates. It also gives the commission the power to control the issue of all stocks, bonds, and securities of these companies engaged in interstate commerce.

It is not necessary to stop to discuss that; but the necessity for some Federal control of the issuance of stock and securities, I think, has developed to the satisfaction of all thinking men on this subject, not only as to railroads, but as to the other great public utilities of the country. It will avoid "wildcat" or reckless financiering, and it will make such securities better investments for the people and a safer basis on which to regulate or fix public charges. It will, in a general way, prohibit the issue of stock without its being fully paid, and it authorizes the commission to fix the conditions under which other securities may be issued and regulates the commissions and discounts, and so forth.

The second and a most important section authorizes the commission to permit consolidations to any extent the commission may think wise for the public interests. In other words, if any companies wish to consolidate their lines or companies where they were competing, which would be in violation of the Sherman Act, they must present to the Interstate Commerce Commission a petition showing the public convenience, necessity, and public interest; and the commission, after a public hearing, may permit such consolidation, in part or in whole, and on such terms or conditions as it may see fit.

I realize that this is an exceedingly important provision, and to some extent it reverses a policy which has been in existence heretofore in this country. I am not standing here now as an advocate of it. I simply suggest it, because it is one of the things we must consider.

I shall not stop to discuss the pros and cons of this question, but I think it is evident to everyone that of the 8,000 or 10,000 telephone companies scattered over this country many of them could be consolidated with advantage to the public, and their service made interchangeable. I do not believe anybody claims that there is any such thing as competition in the telephone business. Only one telephone can be used at a time; and in those communities where two or three telephone companies are operating there is two or three times the usual expense and annoyance to the patrons; but if that is done, of course the commission must have power over service in order to protect the public.

I shall not go further than simply suggest this. To a certain extent the same thing occurs in the telegraph and in the cable systems; but there are many very important questions there which I think the committee should consider, as to whether the competition now existing is of sufficient importance that Congress should prohibit any consolidation. I think that is a question that should be looked into very carefully.

I am not going to discuss this bill at length. The last section of the bill I introduce by request. I think it is fair to state that I am not yet prepared to say that I would be in favor of it. I think it is a question that the committee and the Congress should look into carefully. I am told that certain of our cable systems should be extended at once, in order to connect with valuable territory, especially in Brazil, and protect the commerce and trade of this country in South America; that it is necessary that the cable go in advance of the steamship and the merchant; and that, owing to the fact that the Government occupies the entire field of investment at present, the companies have been unable to procure capital. It is therefore recommended that the Government authorize a temporary loan on security in order to encourage cable extensions, but upon condition that the cable be manufactured in this country.

I am not prepared to say whether that is advisable or necessary. One of the companies reaching South America—the Central & South American Telegraph Co., I think its name is—claims that it has sufficient capital to go ahead with extensions.

One other company claims temporarily it can not get the capital. I do not think any Government aid is needed for any great length of time, and I am not sure that it is needed at all; but it is a question which I think should be carefully considered, because there is no doubt that the demands of the Government and the business interests of this country require the extension of cable systems.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was delayed and came in late. Do I understand that the Senator is now discussing the resolution which he introduced the other day?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I am not asking to take up that resolution, and I would like to have it lie on the table at least for the present.

I only wish to say one more word.

I may be overenthusiastic about the subject, but with a foreign commerce which last year amounted to over $9,000,000,000—the largest foreign commerce, by several billions, that any country ever had in any period of history—with a balance of trade in our favor of over $3,000,000,000—in other words, our exports exceeded our imports by over $3,000,000,000—with the war ended, and being confronted with the increasing competition of other nations, I think it is due the business interests and the people of this country that every effort be made to extend and protect our foreign commerce in South America and, in fact, in all other countries. The telegraph and the cable must precede the steamship; the steamship must accompany the merchant; the banking system must combine with both; and those are the great facilities which our business men need in the development and holding of this foreign commerce.

I have introduced this bill hoping that the Interstate Commerce Committee would, as soon as possible, bring before it the men who have more knowledge upon that subject than I have, that we might consider this most important question.

The bill (S. 5287) to provide for the control, supervision, and operation of telegraph, telephone, marine cable, and radio systems was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Some days ago I introduced, by request, a bill relative to the packing houses. The bill had been introduced in the House by Mr. SIMS, of Tennessee; and I was requested by representatives of the Farmers' Alliance to introduce it in the Senate, because there is to be held here this week a national convention of farmers from all over the country, and they desire to be heard before some committee on this bill. These representatives would have to come many hundreds of miles if the hearings should not take place about the same time in the House and in the Senate. The bill went to the Interstate Commerce Committee in the House. Knowing that to be the fact, I did not feel like asking that it should go to the Agricultural Committee of the Senate, at least in the absence of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, so it went to the Interstate Commerce Committee.

A few days ago I asked unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from the consideration of this bill and that it go to the Agricultural Committee. I was requested by the Senator from Utah to postpone that request, and I make the request now. I want to say that I talked with the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee at that time, and he seemed to have no objection to it, nor did the ranking member of the minority. That committee is burdened with hearings on the railroad question and can not hear witnesses and can not give consideration to this bill for a long while. The Agricultural Committee has been considering the question of some bill with reference to the packers, and has had some hearings upon the question; so that it would be entirely appropriate that this bill should go to the Agricultural Committee and let it take care of the whole situation.

I ask the chairman of the committee now if he has any objection to that course.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator from Iowa has said, I will state that at the time he spoke to me about this bill I had not given it the consideration that I have subsequently given it. I received a communication from the President in reference to this bill and should have given it earlier consideration, but on account of the press of other business it was impossible for me to do so.

The bill as introduced in the House was sent to me with a request that our committee take it up and consider it at our convenience. The situation as it now develops is that we possibly will be through within two weeks—three weeks at the most—with the hearings on the railroad situation. This matter is of such importance and lies so largely along the line of the work of the Interstate Commerce Committee, in that it proposes to take over the rolling stock, the refrigerator cars, and is so intimately related to the transportation system of this country that, in accordance with the request, I feel it to be my duty to insist that the bill shall remain in the hands of our committee, because before this session is over we will have ample time to give it the consideration to which it is entitled.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand the Senator to say that the President of the United States requests that the bill go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. His communication in reference to the bill was addressed to me as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. KENYON. Let me ask the Senator, then, if there is any chance for that committee to hear the representatives of the farming interests of the country who will be here this week?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It may be possible for us to hear them, because we have set aside certain morning hours to have hearings on the railroad bill, and I think perhaps the committee might meet and hear what those representatives have to say, and they might lay before us whatever they desire to present.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator objects, I am not in a position to urge the matter, because it has more or less elements which should be considered by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but I felt that it would be impossible for that committee to consider it for another month, and consequently nothing would be done at this session. I rather think that will be the situation. I withdraw my motion.

NAMING OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. MYERS. I introduce a bill which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. After it is read I should like to say a very few words about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator mean read in full?

Mr. MYERS. Read in full. It is short.

The bill (S. 5297) for the naming of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That that city and community and all thereof situate and now being within the District of Columbia is, and shall be, known and designated as the city of Washington, and the boundaries of the District of Columbia, now and heretofore established by law, are, and shall be, the boundaries thereof; and said city shall be and is the Capital and permanent seat of government of the United States.

SEC. 2. That nothing herein shall repeal, alter, or affect any existing provision of law for the government of the District of Columbia, all of which are continued in full force and effect.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words as to my reasons for giving attention at this time to what may appear to some to be a relatively small matter. Those who are authority in law claim that there is no city of Washington; that it has no existence whatever; that the supposed city of Washington is wholly a myth. From time immemorial, at least from the time of the location of the permanent seat of government of the United States in the District of Columbia, all executive documents, all proclamations and messages of the President, have had appended thereto the words, "Done at the city of Washington" on a certain date, until a few months ago, when some one in official life, who claims to be authority on the subject, informed President Wilson, I understand, that there was no city of Washington. Since then the President has been appending to his official documents the words, "Done in the District of Columbia" on a certain date.

It seems that those of us who are here are simply living or stopping in the District of Columbia. The place in which we do business is the District of Columbia, not the city of Washington or a city of any other name or identity. Massachusetts Avenue, which is near the spot in which we now are, is simply Massachusetts Avenue in the District of Columbia.

Every nation in the world other than the United States, so far as I know, has a capital city, and I think the United States should have a capital city. It does not seem to me very dignified for the District of Columbia, merely encompassing so many square miles in extent, to be the Capital and the seat of government of the United States. Jefferson City is the capital of the State of Missouri, and executive documents there are issued as having been "Done at the city of Jefferson" and not as done in Cole County. The city of Springfield is the capital of Illinois, and executive documents issued there are issued as being "Done at the city of Springfield" and not in Sangamon County. It seems to me that the people of the United States ought to take sufficient pride in their Capital to have it located in a city and for the city to have a name, but it can only be given a name through congressional action. It has none at present. There is a post office here called "Washington," just as a cross-roads country post office named "Smithville" may be located in the midst of a township of prairie country in Minnesota or North Dakota, but the fact that the post office here has a name does not give a name to the city or community around it. The newspapers which are published here bear the name of the city of Washington, while there is no such city. The Washington Post, the Washington Herald, the Washington Times, and the Washingston Star are really misnamed. To be properly named, they should be named the District of Columbia Post, the Herald, Times, and Star.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Does the bill propose to make the limits of the city of Washington coextensive with those of the District of Columbia?

Mr. MYERS. It does.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will that require city taxation to be imposed upon farms that are within the District of Columbia?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; it does not affect taxation or any law whatever in regard to the government of the District of Columbia. The second section of the bill says: "Nothing herein shall repeal, modify, alter, or amend any law regarding the government of the District of Columbia, all of which are continued in full force and effect." The bill is merely a matter of sentiment. It is simply a matter of nomenclature; a bill to give this city a name. Just as Paris is the capital of France, I think our country ought to have a capital located in a city which has a name, not in a nameless city. It is simply a matter of giving a legal name to a place. It was always supposed until a few months ago that the Capital of the United States, the permanent seat of government, was located at the city of Washington, but it is not so. It was simply located in the District of Columbia. It is just as if the city of Jefferson, the capital of Missouri, did not exist; the permanent seat of the government, in that event, would be in Cole County, Mo. This bill would not affect any existing legislation relating to the government of the District of Columbia. It leaves everything of that kind as it is. It gives the city no government, it only gives it a name; that is all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the bill relates solely and purely to the naming of the place where the Capital of the United States is to be located I have no objection to it, but it does seem to me that it ought to be looked into closely.

Mr. MYERS. I have asked that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for that purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that if you are going to make the limits of the city of Washington coextensive with those of the District of Columbia you are going to take in vast stretches of territory that are nothing but farm lands and that ought not to be subject to city taxation, and for that reason the bill ought to be examined very closely as to whether or not it will affect the taxation of property in the District of Columbia outside the city limits.

Mr. MYERS. I want it examined closely by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is simply a matter of nomenclature and arises from a sense of pride. There was a good deal of discussion about it in the newspapers of the city some three or four months ago and some expert on law discovered that there was no city of Washington. It rather offended my pride that my country had no capital city, and I have had it in mind since to undertake to give it one and have introduced this bill for that purpose.

Mr. KIRBY. I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MYERS. I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. KIRBY. I am curious to know what the expert on law considered and how he reached the conclusion that there is no city of Washington?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know what he considered. I only read the newspaper accounts of it. I think, however, he was right. I know of no law creating any city of Washington. There is a law creating the District of Columbia, but there is no law, of which I know, creating the city of Washington; at least, that is what the newspaper reports stated, and I believe it. There is a city popularly known as Washington City. That is the name, the designation given to it by common consent. The city in which Congress sits is called Washington City, but there is, I understand, no authority in law or fact for it. It might as well be called by any other name. I would give it a legal name and status.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment providing that hereafter the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory shall be a retired line officer of the Navy, with rank not below that of rear admiral, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment proposing that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, each fourth-class postmaster in the United States shall be paid a sum not less than 20 per cent of his or her compensation under existing law and not more than 25 per cent thereof as allowance for rent, light, and fuel, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. CALDER submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5261) to legalize informal or defective orders for war supplies and materials, to provide for the cancellation of orders and contracts, for the reimbursement of contractors and manufacturers, for the adjustment of claims or canceled or partially filled contracts and orders, and to provide relief for contractors pending final determination, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the calendar for present consideration Senate joint resolution 202, being a joint resolution requesting the Commission of Fine Arts to submit to Congress certain suggestions concerning memorials and monuments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he expects the joint resolution to lead to any discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I object to anything but morning business at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection until the morning business is concluded.

FARM LABOR.

Mr. GORE. I submit a Senate resolution and I ask that it may be read and lie on the table subject to call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 409), as follows:

Whereas the planting season for the year 1919 is near at hand; and
Whereas the loss of four months at this season is equivalent to the loss of the year; and
Whereas farm labor is both scarce and dear; and
Whereas an abundant harvest is of the greatest concern, not only to producers of this country, but to consumers both at home and abroad: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the drafted men and volunteers in the military forces of the United States should be mustered out of the service as rapidly as the public interest will permit, and that it is the further sense of the Senate that every effort should be made to muster out at once actual farmers and farm laborers who were engaged in farming at the time of entering the military service and who declare their intention to engage in farming during the current calendar year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule and be printed.

SOLDIERS' ROLL.

Mr. POMERENE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 410), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate are hereby directed to retain in the employ of the Senate those persons who served in the Union Army during the late Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and the War with Germany, and whose service in the Senate is necessary and satisfactory, who are not otherwise provided for, and to continue such persons in their positions until cause for their removal shall have been reported to and approved of by the Senate and their removal directed.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that to-morrow, at the close of the morning business, or as soon thereafter as possible, if I may be permitted, I intend to make some remarks on the proposition of a world league of nations and some questions incident thereto, including the approaching peace conference between the warring nations of the world.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR BRADY.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the 19th of January has been set apart as the day to hear addresses upon the life and services of the late Senator GALLINGER. I desire to give notice that at the same time addresses will be made upon the life and services of the late Senator BRADY.

COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask my friend, the Senator from North Dakota, before he proceeds, to yield to me just for a moment to renew the request which I made for unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 202. If it leads to any talk or discussion I shall withdraw it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 202) requesting the Commission of Fine Arts to submit to Congress certain suggestions, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Commission of Fine Arts be, and they are hereby, requested to report to Joint Committee on the Library for its consideration and submission to Congress suggestions for monuments and other memorials to commemorate the heroes and events of the great war, and the best methods of obtaining artists to execute the same with the view of securing artistic excellence in such memorials.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, even before the peace delegates have assembled the question of a league of nations has assumed a dominant position in the eyes of the world. It has been given more space in the press of this country, Great Britain, and France than any other problem which will come before the peace commission. It is the subject of discourse wherever men assemble. Its supreme importance has been recognized by the introduction in this body of a resolution advising and cautioning our delegates against precipitate or premature action; and its dangers have been expounded by able Senators.

But, Mr. President, notwithstanding this caution, the world looks with hopeful and expectant eyes to this Peace Commission for some international arrangement that will make impossible another such war. We have seen the thunderbolt of war shot from serenest skies of peace. We have seen nations basking in the sun of tranquillity suddenly swept by the hurricane of a life and death struggle. We have seen more than four years of the most devastating and sanguinary, the most savage and brutal battles that have ever blackened the earth. And as we reach its close, even the shouts of the victors are drowned by the lamentations of mothers, by the weeping of fatherless children, by the anguished sobs of millions upon millions of poor bereaved mortals. And as we look upon all this devastation and misery, and contemplate the many, many millions of brave boys to whom life was sweet and fair, who have gone down to death to save the world from this bloody monster of military autocracy, their lofty hopes and ambitions entombed with their crushed and mangled bodies, and when we realize that many, many millions of young girls, whom God had created to reign queen of heart and home, must live their lives unwed, robbed of their God-given right of motherhood, and doomed to walk down life's path alone, in a land laid waste by devastation's flaming hand—robbed of the stronger arm of man to support and guide, or the gentle hand of child to caress when the wearied night of age comes on, we may well ask ourselves, Is it impossible for civilization to free itself from the ever-impending dangers of such a scourge? Is it impossible to hold nations to the same moral code in their international relations that each imposes upon its citizens in their personal relations? Must history repeat itself over and over again? Must our children's children suffer and die as their fathers have suffered and died to propitiate the God of War?

Mr. President, the great Teutonic empires answered these questions in the negative. They declared that the nation could never be held to any code of Christian morals; that the power to conquer carried with it the duty to crush and destroy whenever such action could inure to the benefit of the most powerful.

Against that monstrous doctrine, with all it meant to the future of the world, the unprepared entente powers of Europe, with the final assistance of our own country, fought, and fought to the death, the great military central powers.

Are we now to be told that those nations which so fought and conquered, and the blood of whose sons encarmined the land and the seas for the principle of world justice, are now unable to devise any means to perpetuate those principles? If so, how vain have been our sacrifices, and what a mockery is our pretended civilization!

Mr. President, a suffering and agonized world will never accept the verdict that the god of military prowess, now floored and manacled, shall now be liberated without tether or chain.

I am optimistic enough to believe that great world wars can be prevented, and that the time to present and adopt the restrictive or preventive measures is now and not some indefinite time in the future—is to-day, when the awful horrors and consequences of war are apparent to every heart—and not when those horrors are forgotten and only the military glamor and glory remain to influence the sentiments of humanity.

To-day is the opportune time for the crystallization of the peace sentiment of the world into effective, international compact and guaranty. To-day, at the close of one of the most unprovoked, one of the most inexcusable, and the most bloody wars of all the ages is the auspicious moment for action and final settlement. In Versailles, in view of that battle field where was once a paradise, but now a devastated and desolate hell of ruins, is the place to write and promulgate a new code of international relations and conduct.

Most of those who have expressed themselves on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere against a league of nations predicate their conclusions on the ideas presented by extremists rather than on the views of a far greater though perhaps less voluble number of supporters of a treaty of nations to insure the peace of the world.

In pointing out the dangers of a league of nations they presuppose a league which in effect would constitute a new United States of the world, a confederacy of all the nations of the world, with an international legislature, an international court, an international president, and an international control of the armies and navies of the component powers. They presuppose a confederacy by which each nation surrenders its individual sovereignty to an extent similar to that surrendered by each State entering into the American Union. Were all nations equal or nearly equal in intelligence, in national character, in stability, of temperament, were there no superior and inferior nations and races of the world, no color lines and no race prejudices, the world might be better because of such a league. But we must accept the world situation as it really is. And while we should accord to each nation, notwithstanding its intellectual inferiority, its just and inalienable rights, the right to live and work out its own destiny, we could not assimilate all these inferior races without lowering our own national character and national standard. And therefore, Mr. President, such a league of nations would not only be impracticable but it would, in my humble opinion, be a wrong to the great intellectual nations of the world. Most of the argument of the Senator from Missouri, and some at least of the arguments of other Senators, were based on the hypothesis of such a league of nations. Mr. President, there can not be and there will not be constructed such a league of all nations of the world. With the fall of the premise must fall the deduction.

It may well be asked, then, what kind of a league of nations could with propriety and safety be recognized and adopted by this peace conference?

Mr. President, in replying to this query I shall present the conservative side of the problem. I shall take the world as it actually exists with its real, human, and national propensities, and shall not attempt to write an equal and perfect law for an unequal and imperfect world people. Nor shall I be so presumptuous as to even suggest that a code based upon present world conditions would be applicable a few centuries hence or for all time. There may come a time when because of density of population the law of the survival of the fittest may justify the conquest of sections of the earth held by peoples less fitted to enjoy its domains, just as the Indians of the Western Continent were doomed, that a wiser, a more enlightened and a more noble race might found a higher and a better civilization. It may be that nations now marching in the van of civilization may become so degenerate that they will be but stumbling blocks to the advancing world of intellectuality and progress.

But, Mr. President, so far as we can look into the future, and we can look forward at least a few centuries, we can predicate our action with a reasonable degree of certainty and feel assured that the course of international justice which we shall now prescribe will be applicable to those future conditions.

So let us invoke only those fundamental principles upon which we can all agree; and having thus agreed upon them, let us then pause and question ourselves as to whether it is either wise or necessary to project our international agreements further into the realms of complexities, uncertainties, or interferences.

Mr. President, I shall, therefore, assume in this argument that the edicts, "Thou shalt not steal" and "Thou shalt not murder," written by the hand of Deity and imprinted on every human heart, are laws which should govern not only individuals in their relations to each other but are also laws which should govern nations, which are but collections of individuals, in their international relations. I shall, of course, not attempt to convince anyone who will deny the applicability of these rules to nations. All I can say to him is that the German ruling and military caste denied the rule, and the balance of the world affirmed it, and that the victory of the allied cause against the central powers has established by the arbitrament of war the doctrine that nations shall not be exempt in their international relations from the moral code which each enforces upon its own people. That principle being thus settled, there is, therefore, left only the question as to how that moral code shall be established and maintained between nations.

Well, Mr. President, the first thing to do, and the most natural thing to do, is that these nations, each and every one, which have banded together and fought together to establish this moral code as an international rule of conduct, shall agree to and with each other that they will abide by that principle in all their dealings with each other and with every other nation that shall join them in that compact. That they will rob no other nation of its territory or sovereignty; that they will not murder its people for territorial aggrandizement. That is a sufficient beginning, for if all the great nations agree to and do abide by this rule there will be no difficulty in compelling the little nations to conform to it.

The very first clause of the very first article of this agreement should, therefore, declare that each independent nation of the world, as it shall exist at the time this compact shall be executed, has the right to live and work out its own destiny free from any impending danger of any mighty military neighbor.

If you ask why we adopt this particular time as the basis of agreement, I answer: World nations have just been shattered and destroyed by this mighty earthquake, and the broken fragments can not be replaced in their old positions. New nations must and will be created, not only to satisfy the natural aspirations of peoples but also to encircle the nation whose madness precipitated all this slaughter and misery, lest with returning peace there might develop again the old malady; and, further, the impossibility of readjusting the boundaries of Europe to conform to ancient sovereignties. To do that we should be compelled to return France to ancient Gaul, Gaul to Rome, and Rome to the immortal gods.

We should then write into this compact that no nation should make a war of conquest on any other nation; that no nation should forcibly seize or annex any portion of the territory of any other nation or claim or exercise a control or suzerainty over it or in any way limit its complete sovereign rights and independence.

We should provide in that compact for an international court. It matters little whether you call it a court of arbitration or an advisory international commission or The Hague tribunal. Each of the contracting nations should then agree that in case of international disputes it would submit its controversy, whatever that controversy might be, to this court, to the end that the claims of both parties might have fair hearing and publicity not only in both countries but in every other country, and that this court or commission should make its findings of fact and suggest a course of action to bring about a settlement or a reference of the question at issue to arbitration. This compact should then provide that no one of the contracting nations should go to war against another until it had thus submitted its grievances to this court or board; or, still being aggrieved at these findings, that it would withhold any physical force until its grievance and the dereliction of its adversary had been submitted to its cocontractors, the other great nations of the world, and an opportunity given them to use their good offices to secure reparation and justice for any wrong and a final reconciliation.

With such a solemn compact of nations, executed by all the great nations of the world to and with each other, the danger of any great war, any world war, would be pressed far, very far, into the realm of impossibility.

Does anyone believe that had such a great international agreement been in existence prior to 1914, even Germany with her autocratic and irresponsible government would have dared break her compact with each and every one of the other great nations of the world? Does anyone believe that with such a solemn compact with every other nation Austria-Hungary would have defied the world and pounced upon little Serbia and thus have lighted this flame of war?

And, Mr. President, if these nations could not have faced the whole world with such a broken pledge, under their autocratic forms of government, how much less would be the danger under truly representative forms of government which have come into the world to stay?

With such an agreement we should need no great centralized world government, no international army and navy, no international police to enforce an international court's decrees. Both honor and self-interest would unite to compel adherence to this international compact.

There is an ever-growing sense of international honor and integrity in the world, and the very fact that Germany broke her pledged faith with France and Great Britain to respect the territorial and political sovereignty of Belgium, and by that breach sought to crush France at a single blow, has intensified and strengthened this sense of international integrity and created a deeper world sense of abhorrence against international bad faith. And the fact that Great Britain declared that she would uphold her treaty with Belgium, even though there was no bond compelling her to fight on the side of France, though her act thereby put her very life in jeopardy, has given to international obligations a sacredness never before attained in the history of the world.

Mr. President, I want the bond and I want Germany's signature to that bond. She has been the only country that has threatened the peace of the whole world for the last 45 years, and to meet her threat every other nation has had to keep itself armed to the teeth and weighted to the verge of poverty to maintain mighty armaments. No matter how bad or unreliable a man may be, I would rather have his signature evidencing his obligation to me than to be without this written proof and the moral influence that goes with it. When one places his signature to an instrument, he must give good reason why he repudiates it; without his signature he may be under no obligation to explain.

And, so, after the terms of peace have been determined by the victors in this war and the new nations created shall take their places in the world, then I want the joint bond of the central powers to assure international justice. I want the signature of Germany, not only as an evidence that she forever formally repudiates the brutal doctrines of her old rulers and military castes that "Might makes right," but I also want it because I know the industrious, conservative, and frugal German people, rising from the ashes of their calamities, will reconstruct a great nation. And as deeply as I hate Kaiserism and the abominable doctrines of military Germany I believe we should extend the hand of brotherhood and friendship to democratic Germany when its people have repudiated both these stigmas on real German character and have steered their country clear of the worse malady, Bolshevism.

A word now in reference to the stock criticisms against a league of nations.

Mr. President, no matter how much we may legislate, how many resolutions we may introduce and pass, three things are certain: The first, already accomplished, is that acting within his constitutional authority the President has appointed delegates to sit with delegates from other allied nations to agree upon terms of peace; second, that these delegates will proceed to dictate and agree upon such terms of peace; and third, that they will not rise from their deliberations or attach their signatures to any instrument of peace that shall leave untouched or unsettled the question of the prevention of another such war. If they should do so their action would meet the condemnation of the people of all the countries who have endured the horrors and privations of this war. It will not do to say in one breath that war is wrong and in the next breath that such wrong can not be checked.

Now, there seems to be a fear, which I believe to be unfounded, that these delegates will not take up and dispose of these questions in their logical order; that they will take up the question of prevention of future wars before they close this war, or that they will somehow work in the project of a league of all nations before they settle the question immediately involved among the warring nations. To my mind these apprehensions are unwarranted. Remember this peace commission, Mr. President, represents only those countries whose armies have joined to overthrow the central powers. It does not at present include even the delegates from the enemy countries. Therefore, the very first question that will absorb the attention of the peace commission must necessarily be the terms that will be imposed upon the several enemy countries as conditions of peace. Upon this the only voice that can possibly be heard will be the voice of the victors. A league of world nations can not be consummated until such world nations are subsequently brought into conference. What, then, are the immediate terms which this particular commission will deal with? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] very tersely and very properly says they are restitution, reparation, and guaranty. But, Mr. President, there could be no guaranty without guarantors, and in this instance it means not only a guaranty on the part of the vanquished to conform to the peace conditions imposed, but on the part of the victors to enforce and maintain every condition that may be necessary to assure the performance of those conditions.

You, therefore, find yourselves engaged in forming a league of the greater nations of the world, the victors and the vanquished, as the most important and immediate factor of this peace treaty, and all there is left for discussion or contention is the general form of this league and the extent to which other powers shall be invited into it.

We are asked by the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to advise our delegates not to enter into the discussion of any general league for the prevention of future wars until after they have completed their task of entering into terms of peace conditions. That, Mr. President, it seems to me, they will and must do. But in the speech of the Senator in support of his resolution he suggests that the question of an international alliance for peace might better be considered not only at some future time but by a wholly independent and differently constituted body. With that contention I can not agree. I have already stated in general terms, and shall before I close point out in particular, why I think that course would be a mistake. We all, of course, understand how far-reaching and how complex must be the questions that will arise in the discussion of a general league for peace. But the Senator has pointed out no line of demarcation between what must be disposed of to make the peace treaties effective and enduring and what should be left for further deliberation to which other countries may be invited to participate. On the contrary, both his resolution and his address contemplate that to a certain extent this present peace commission shall provide against the dangers of a recurrence of such a catastrophe as the world has just passed through, the very thing and the only thing a league could accomplish.

The second paragraph of his resolution reads:

> That for the safeguarding of those aims the first essential is a definite understanding that the same necessity arising in the future, there shall be the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

And in support of this the Senator declares:

> It is clear, then, that our attention should now be directed to the enforcement of the remainder of our war aims, now best expressed as restitution, reparation, and guaranties; and to the purpose to complete, to perfect, and to guarantee those aims as we pass to the state of formal peace.

And again:

> The definite problem of formally ending the war is: By what measures as to restitution, reparation, and guaranties shall we assume that the war now won shall stay won, that the menace now removed shall stay forever removed? Germane in a broad sense is the question of what measure of safeguarding we may make the recurrence of any similar menace in the future most improbable.

The Senator, therefore, agrees that this present peace commission, not some future commission, must provide for restitution, must provide for reparation, and must provide for guaranties that the menace "now removed shall stay forever removed." Well, Mr. President, if the peace commission does all that, there is nothing left for a league of nations to do, but it can only do that by entering into a league of at least the principal nations of the world. It means, no matter how distasteful the term may be to any Senator, a league of the nations making the guaranty.

And that brings us right up to what shall constitute the limit of this guaranty as fixed by this commission, a limit that no one has pointed out, and, with the thousands of questions which will enter into this peace negotiation, no man on earth can now possibly determine.

The difficulty of predetermining the scope of action of this commission will become more apparent as we investigate some of the main features that will necessarily have to be determined by this peace commission as terms of peace. Let us see what they are. First, there is the question of restitution. What does that mean? We are all agreed that the first thing to be restored are the Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. Those are Provinces with well-defined borders. Their restitution is the simplest of all the questions involved. This peace commission may find it necessary in order to assist in securing the future peace of the world to carry this principle of restitution farther along Germany's western boundary, and to return to Belgium all the territory wrested from her in 1839. The allies may deem this necessary to place Germany in a position where the wicked teachings of her military and political rulers which brought on this war can not in the future influence any great section of Europe and thus reendanger its peace and safety. They may extend the borders of Belgium and press Germany back within her old borders east of the Rhine, a boundary which at once becomes not only natural, but would better enable Belgium to defend herself against another attack. I think the average American would agree that those sections of Germany lying west of the Rhine, including Luxemburg, formerly a part of Belgium, might well be apportioned to Belgium to partially compensate her for the awful ravages committed against her territory and people.

I would not depend alone on the league of nations to maintain peace, but to make assurance doubly sure I would close up wherever possible every avenue of danger, just as I would lock up a madman with murderous propensities until he had been unquestionably cured of his dangerous hallucinations.

Nor is that all.

The Senator agrees that there should be a cordon of countries surrounding the Teutonic powers on the east and south that would forever disillusion them of their dream of mitteleuropa, which would dominate first Europe and then the world. In that I think he agrees with the President, for one of the President's fourteen principles of enduring peace provides for the reconstruction of ancient Poland. When the armies of Poland were annihilated, her once vast territory was divided among Russia, Germany, and Austria. Now, one of the duties imposed upon this peace conference will be to reconstruct this Empire from territory of the three great countries which robbed her of her national heritage. This will be another case of restitution.

Again, we have already recognized the Czecho-Slavs as a nation, and the Jugo-Slavs demand from the allies proper recognition. We are morally pledged to destroy the suzerainty of Turkey over European States, and to make independent countries over which she formerly held sway. These will be most perplexing duties, but they must be performed and by this commission. If not so performed, then within 25 years mitteleuropa will be an accomplished fact and the fruits of all our victories blasted.

And again, each time we create a new country we reduce the size, the population, wealth, and ability of our great enemies, Germany and Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, to compensate for war losses. Serious questions will then arise as to the apportionment of war indemnities among the nations which were in arms against the United States and her allies. You will sever from Germany Alsace and Lorraine, which have furnished many thousands of soldiers in the battles against France. Naturally this portion of new France can pay nothing toward this indemnity. You also take from Austria-Hungary a large portion of its territory, and with Russian territory you constitute new Slav Provinces—a Jugo-Slav country, a Czecho-Slav country, a new Poland. Although portions of these new countries were battling against us, you will find it extremely difficult to say that the part taken from Austria-Hungary shall bear its proportion of taxes to make amends for international transgressions. In the enforced payment of these demands, however apportioned, the nations now banded against Germany must agree to stand united until the last dollar has been paid. And there, Mr. President, we have a league of nations, a treaty for offensive warfare, if necessary, and certainly a treaty which binds them for united offense may very properly bind them into an agreement to maintain a condition which would prevent a military nation like Germany, through intrigue or force, from ever attempting to nullify an agreement for compensation entered into with her or to destroy this cordon of nations, whose viselike grip assists in holding her to her agreement. There are so many, even hundreds, of these collateral questions which will need to be considered that I believe it unwise for this Senate at this time to limit or define the subjects which may or may not be debated and acted upon by our delegates.

I do not consider that we are bound to greatly respect any claim on the part of Russia. Her action in this war has been worse than the action of an enemy. She betrayed her bleeding and suffering allies at a time when her assistance was most needed. She surrendered to German intrigue, and her leaders were bought by German gold. The atrocities committed by the present Bolsheviki government of Russia, or rather the usurpers of Russian Government, forfeit for her the respect and confidence of every nation of the civilized world, and relieve her allies from any debt which might otherwise have been her due.

Our next step, then, Mr. President, is to put these new governments on the map of Europe. That means, first, that we must solve the most delicate and difficult problem of boundaries. Then, having established these nations and fixed their boundaries, are we to dissolve our peace commission and return our soldiers to their homes, leaving the weak and newly created nations to their own fate, with no written understanding or guaranty for their protection? Observing, as we have already observed in the last four years of history, the wonderful diplomatic machinery of the German Government, and remembering her ability to bribe and thereby secure the defeat of gigantic Russia and subject her to her control, how long would these nations, discordant by nature and weak from centuries of bondage, last before they would fall to the wiles and become mere puppets in the hands of the Teutonic powers?

Is it not, therefore, absolutely essential that we insert in the peace agreement that we shall now make with Germany and Austria that no nation shall seek either through diplomacy or through war to destroy the territorial or political sovereignty and independence of any one of these new nations, and not leave that question for Germany and Austria to assent to or not at some future time. Now is the time to bind them, and we can not logically or justly bind them without binding ourselves. If we fail to do that, we shall have left open the gateway for another worse war than that which we have just passed through. This, then, means that these particular nations must enter into a league, if you see fit to call it a league. I prefer to call it a treaty. And they must enter into it now. They must make a treaty now whereby each one binds itself not to do those things which the treaty says shall not be done.

We have, therefore, Mr. President, before we have gotten half way through with our peace agreement, found ourselves in league with Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Roumania, Serbia, and Greece, and such new nations as shall be created. We have agreed that neither one of us shall ever attempt to destroy any one of these nations; that these nations shall live in the world free from the danger of destruction and absorption by some powerful military neighbor; and we must necessarily compel our enemies to join us in those assurances, and that is a league of nations to defend the existence and rights of other nations.

But, Mr. President, to accomplish this we do not need to conform the agreement or treaty to any Utopian dream of a United States of the world. We applaud the action of Great Britain in coming to the defense of France and Belgium to maintain the integrity of her Belgian treaty. Great Britain kept her word; France kept her word; and if we enter into an agreement we will keep our word, and that coalition will hold other nations to their word. We do not need to surrender our several sovereignties in order to maintain an agreement founded upon justice to all nations. It is sufficient that we rest its maintenance upon the honor of the great nations entering into the compact.

The Senator from Pennsylvania admits, nay, he strongly asserts, that under present world conditions we have an interest in Europe; that as in the days of Monroe we foresaw a great danger to us in any European nation extending and developing its power in South America, so to-day we recognize that any single power which could dominate the whole of Europe would be a menace to the welfare of the United States; and the logic of his argument is that we may properly say to European power, you shall not absorb, because of your numbers and military strength, the smaller nations of Europe, and thereby threaten the peace of the world, and with it the peace and safety of the United States. Therefore, Mr. President, we acknowledge our right from a sense of responsibility to ourselves and the world to make this treaty, to establish these new nations, and to guarantee their existence for at least such a time as will enable them to stand on their own feet. There would be nothing in this proposal to prevent smaller nations from uniting for any just economic reason if their people so desired, or greater nations from subdividing if any section became dissatisfied and was able to accomplish its severance.

There has been much said concerning a great standing army that would be required to guarantee the existence of these nations. Mr. President, it would not be necessary to have any great army or a unit of any great army to guarantee it. Once establish these new nations, this cordon of nations surrounding Germany and Austria-Hungary, sustain them until they become really nationalized, supplement that with this world agreement that no nation shall wage a war of conquest against another, and no one country or even several countries will ever dare to break its contract with all the other nations, including the United States.

But you say Germany broke her treaty relations with Belgium, and why will she not break any other treaty? First, because Germany was not then restrained by a compact with all the nations of the world. Second, because Germany was then the Kaiser, with his military autocracy. The Germany of the future will not be the Germany of the past. Third, she will not dare attempt to break it. But notwithstanding the fact that she has heretofore disdained treaty obligations, there is a sense of obligation not only on the part of the countries entering into these new treaty relations, but the moral sense of every civilized nation is that its government is in honor bound to make good its treaty promises. Its only excuse for not doing so would be when the conditions, through change of circumstances, have made its continuance a danger to the vital interests of the country, and even under such conditions it should only be broken upon due and proper notice.

We now know, whether we knew it at the beginning of the war or not, that the whole purpose of Germany was to add to her territorial domains at the expense of her neighbors—a case of robbery pure and simple. If Germany had known in the beginning that the United States and all the other great powers would enter the war in the defense of Belgium and in the defense of France, she never would have dared to inaugurate a war in violation of such a contract.

Now, I want this peace conference to establish a league of that kind. I do not care whether it goes one step further. I hope it will not attempt to go too far. Such an agreement standing alone, without any provision for armies and navies, would be a league of nations, and it would be league enough to maintain the peace of the world. I certainly should not be satisfied, and I do not believe that in the end the Senator from Pennsylvania would be satisfied, with a mere agreement that, "the same necessity arising in the future, there shall be the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization." Such an agreement, in my opinion, is altogether too vague and uncertain as a basis for insuring joint action. Who is to determine whether the necessity is the same? Suppose one or more of the contracting nations thinks it is not the same. What becomes of your accord?

But if all of these nations agree that neither Great Britain, the United States, Germany, nor any other country will make war against any of these nations without first submitting its grievances in the manner I have suggested, then every nation knows exactly what its duty is and what its action should be as against the offending nation.

Leaving aside the difficulty of determining at any moment what may be the hidden purpose of any threatened war against another nation, we would still be left to surmise as to whether the necessities were at all similar. They never, of course, could be exactly the same. On the other hand, if we all agree that the same moral law which governs relations between individuals shall govern the relations of nations to each other, it is then very easy for us to codify a few general principles embodying the fundamental rights of nations. If the principle "Thou shalt not steal" is just as applicable to a collection of a hundred million people constituting a nation as it is to each individual of that nation—if we agree that every civilized nation has a right to enjoy full and complete independence and every right claimed by the most powerful nations, then why can we not embody those declarations in a new international code and agree jointly and severally to abide by them?

Having once declared them, having once declared by a solemn compact of all the signatory nations that we should uphold them, we can safely leave to the nations signing the agreement the question of entering a war against any one nation that should threaten to break the compact. Of course, such an agreement would not make a war absolutely impossible, any more than our civil laws make murder absolutely impossible. But it would make war by any great nation for an unlawful purpose so improbable that it would be almost the equivalent to an impossibility. It is not necessary that we invite Afghanistan or Paraguay. It is not necessary that we invite every quarrelsome little country of Central America or Europe to join in this compact. Their quarrels are but itching spots on the physical world. They are never serious except as lending an excuse for their greedy neighbors to absorb them. And once you declare and agree that they shall not be subject to absorption by any power, you have eliminated the cause of war by eliminating the advantages of war.

But there is another, and to my mind a far greater, reason for enunciating in the peace instrument itself the real obligations of the contracting parties, rather than an agreement that "the same necessity arising in the future, there shall be the same complete accord and cooperation." First, I do not believe it would be possible to ever again secure the same cooperation, even though similar cause might be imaginable. If we will pause to consider how long this war continued before Italy threw her force with the entente powers, and how much longer before the United States saw fit to enter the contest, even though we knew from the beginning the real purposes of Germany, we can easily comprehend the difficulties of reuniting all of the same powers, even under similar conditions. Without a written compact, are we sure that even our own country would enter a similar war were we not provoked into it as we were provoked into this war?

The defense of our international rights on the seas, the murder of our citizens, were the immediate acts which wrenched us from our old moorings of noninterference in European wars. And while we all agree now and say that we were fighting this war for the safety of civilization we all know very well that we would not have entered the war except for the relentless U-boat campaign of Germany. Had Germany said to this country, We will immediately cease our ruthless submarine warfare; we will sink no merchant ships without first giving such ships an opportunity to surrender and care for the safety of passengers and crew, and had Germany kept her faith in such a promise, we would never have been in this war.

Now, I want to put this Nation in a position in which, should another such a world cause arise, it is bound in honor to uphold these principles, submarine or no submarine, violation of our commerce or no violation. And I want this Government's written bond to that effect, setting its seal and apprising the world of its policy. Mr. President, we are no more justified in asserting that we would go into some future war for the safety of civilization than we would be justified in saying that we would have gone into this war even though there had been no violation of our commercial rights.

I sincerely hope that one effect of this war will be to bring into closer unity the divers populations which make up our American citizenship, and that we shall all become American only in sentiment, free from sympathies for one foreign country and hostility toward another. But up to the beginning of this war that was not true in this country, and it is not wholly true to-day, much as we would wish it to be otherwise, and we must deal with facts as they exist. The success of Germany was not looked upon by the great mass of German-Americans as endangering civilization. A great many, of course, fully comprehended just what Teutonic success would mean to the world, but a far greater number of that race did not fully comprehend it or accept the general world conclusion. Suppose in the near future Italy or Russia should ascend to such military power as would threaten the subjugation of all Europe. The Italian-American or the Russian-American, as the case might be, would most naturally be slow to regard that supremacy as dangerous to the civilization of the world. On the other hand, the Sinn Fein element of our American citizenship would look upon the aggrandizement of any nation which threatened the destruction of Great Britain as a most propitious advance toward a higher world civilization.

Why, Mr. President, we have so many little European nations in this country to-day that presidents of new European republics are elected in New York. I know of no better way to crystallize the divers sentiments of all these divers nationalities into one great dominating American sentiment than a single declaration on the part of America that she stands for the maintenance of the life and liberty and independence of all the civilized nations of the world, hating none and sympathetic with all. Then, and then only, will we be safe in the expectation that we will guide ourselves into a just war without respect to what nations we shall ally ourselves with or what nations we shall make war against.

Mr. President, I find everywhere in the debates on this subject in the Senate the prevailing idea that a league of nations means interference with the internal affairs of each component nation. I do not believe there is any possible danger of any intelligent commission ever inserting such an obligation in a treaty of peace. If they should so forget national sentiment, neither France, Great Britain, nor the United States would ever ratify such a treaty or league of nations compact. With the internal affairs of Russia, after this war is once settled, we shall not interfere. She may divide herself into two nations or into two hundred nations if her people see fit; she may be conservative and peaceful or by her Bolshevika course her people may kill each other. That is their affair. All this league could say is that she shall not attempt to undo the work we have done to assure the peace of the world; that she shall not attempt to crush Poland or the Jugo-Slavs, under whatever name may be given their country. When we declared the Monroe doctrine, which was in effect and to all purposes a league, even though pronounced only by one nation, the United States guaranteed the territorial and political integrity of every South and Central American State. This country has, however, never claimed or assumed by reason of that doctrine the right to dictate any of the internal affairs of such States, at least without first obtaining the request of the government itself to assist in maintaining order.

Again, it has been argued that if we claim the right to interfere with the internal affairs of the European nations, we must expect to accord to those same nations the right to interfere with the internal affairs of the new world. But, Mr. President, there is nothing in any league proposal I have ever heard of which authorizes such an interference with domestic or internal affairs.

Then, again, is brought to the front the Japanese question of race exclusion. Mr. President, this question can not arise in any league of nations which preserves the sovereign independence of each nation. The question of race exclusion or inclusion is a domestic question only. The right to preserve its racial character, its customs, ideals, institutions, and a form of government that conforms to that character, is the most sacred, as well as the most vital, right of every real nation.

And, Mr. President, if nations would assert that right upon the necessity of maintaining racial purity alone, and not upon the offensive and in many respects unfounded claim of superiority, there could and would be no cause of just complaint against exclusion laws. If Japan afforded such opportunities for exploitation of resources as should invite the immigration into her domains of many millions of the Caucasian race, she would be justified in saying to the Caucasian countries, "We do not question the equality of your people, but if you come in such numbers there must result either assimilation or two distinct races living in one territory. If we assimilate we lose the best of our Nippon character without gaining the best of yours. If we do not assimilate we destroy the solidarity of our nation, the oneness of its ideals, and thereby dim its glory and limit its future achievements and possibilities. We will accord to you all the rights, honor, and respect accorded other great nations, but for these important reasons your people can not marry or live with our people."

So, Mr. President, this country must sacredly preserve the right to say to every other country, not that we are your superiors, but that we must build our national structure on the foundation of Caucasian character and cement it with the purest of Caucasian blood. And on the assertion of such a policy no nation could possibly take offense.

And, Mr. President, even weak nations have the same right to protect their people from stronger or more dominant races of men. I was in Panama a few years ago when its legislature was discussing a proposed exclusion bill. There were a goodly number of negroes in that legislative assembly very active and earnest in support of that exclusion measure. I asked an interpreter to explain whom they proposed to exclude and why. He informed me that the bill excluded Japanese, Chinese, Hindoos, and North Africans; that is, Egyptians, Moroccans, and so forth. It did not exclude the blacks from the jungles of South Africa. These colored representatives were frank and open in expressing their reasons. They said the Japanese and Chinese are very industrious, while our people are not, and in a few years their industry would manifest itself in accumulations. They said that the Hindoos were very frugal and lived much more economically than the natives and that the North African people were sharp traders and peddlers; and so they proposed to protect themselves against peoples who were more industrious, more frugal, and superior traders or merchants. Satisfied with their mode of life and desiring to avoid becoming a mere subservient people, they had a perfect right to protect themselves in this way against peoples whose superiority in these special respects threatened their destruction.

This, however, is a little outside the general argument, but I mention it to show that the right of exclusion, being a purely domestic right, can not and will not be endangered by such a treaty as I have suggested to maintain the peace of the world.

Again, it is claimed that our Monroe doctrine will be endangered. So far from endangering that doctrine we would strengthen it. To-day that doctrine rests entirely on the policy and on the power of the United States to maintain the territorial and political integrity of each one of these American States as against any European power. The league of nations which adopts as its guiding principle the independence of every nation of the world, which guarantees its territorial and political life and integrity, certainly can not be said to endanger our Monroe doctrine, which guarantees the independence of the nations of the western world only.

Again, this league of nations is attacked on the ground that it is an entangling alliance with European powers; that the traditional policy of this Nation, advised by Washington and strengthened by precedent, has been to avoid entangling ourselves in European quarrels. It is true, Mr. President, that the Father of his Country advised against entangling alliances with any foreign nations. But is an agreement with all nations on some practical scheme to maintain and enforce peace and justice an alliance in the sense used by Washington? It is no more an alliance, Mr. President, than any treaty made with any nation or set of nations to follow a definite course. When we entered into a treaty with Great Britain in 1850 to the effect that any canal cut across the Isthmus of Panama should be free to the vessels of all nations of the world on equal terms, both these nations were bound in honor to maintain that principle against any nation that would attempt to disregard it. Was that an entangling alliance with an European power?

Again, very shortly after the inauguration of this Government, while the Farewell Address of our first President was still ringing in the ears of his countrymen, we declared the Monroe doctrine, by which we guaranteed the territorial integrity of every nation of the Western Hemisphere against the conquest of any nation of the world. We never regarded this as an entangling alliance. And yet to-day Belgium and France are next-door neighbors compared with Argentina and other South American States, while our trade relations with Europe are ten times greater than those with South America.

Again, but a few years ago we entered into an agreement with Great Britain, Japan, and Russia to conserve and protect the lives of the seals of the Pribilof Islands, to protect them not only against the citizens of the contracting parties, but against the citizens of any other country. Is it possible that we can without a breath of criticism enter into a treaty with these nations of Europe and Asia to protect the lives of a few thousand seals and yet we shall not be permitted to enter into treaty relations with all the great nations of the world to save the lives of millions upon millions of our fellow beings?

Mr. President, we have reached a position in commerce and civilization where every nation has a vital interest in the peace and welfare of every other nation of the world, an interest of far greater moment than Alaskan seal, Newfoundland fisheries, or even isthmian canals.

If you still insist that this would be an alliance, let me ask you a most direct and pertinent question: Do you believe that the United States, as well as the world, is far better off to-day than either would have been had the central powers been victorious in this war? I know your answer will be yes. I do not attempt to argue with those who would answer no, because they so fail to grasp the seriousness of the issue that argument would be futile. Then you are glad that we went into this war and entered into this alliance because of the big thing that was at stake—the safety of civilization and the happiness of the world—and not because of the comparatively little thing—the violation of our commercial rights.

Then, Mr. President, if you justify our alliance with France, Great Britain, and Italy in this war to protect the safety and civilization of the world, then how in Heaven's name can you condemn an alliance with the same and other countries to prevent another assault upon the safety and civilization of the world? How can you in one breath approve the alliance to make war to save the world and in the next breath condemn an alliance to save the world by the prevention of any savage and brutal war which might threaten it?

Mr. President, epitomizing into terms of definite declaration a practical agreement to assure world peace and justice, this peace commission should agree upon a new international code or constitution declaring these fundamental principles:

First. That each and every independent nation of the world has a right to live, and in perfect security enjoy its territorial and political sovereignty, and to work out its own national destiny free from any impending danger from any more powerful neighbor.

Second. That no nation entering into this compact shall make war of conquest against any other nation.

Third. That no such nation shall forcibly annex any portion of the territory of any other nation, or claim or exercise a control or suzerainty over it, or in any way limit its sovereign rights or independence.

Fourth. That there shall be maintained an international court of arbitration or conciliation.

Fifth. That each nation joining in this compact shall, in case of international dispute between any of them, submit its controversy to this court to the end that the claims of both parties may have fair hearing and publicity not only in each of the contending countries but in every other country entering into this compact.

Sixth. That this court shall make and publish in all the countries joining in this compact its finding of fact and its suggestions of the acts to be done or course to be pursued to bring about an amicable settlement of the controversy.

Seventh. That if either country is dissatisfied with the findings and suggestions of this court, it shall nevertheless withhold the use of any physical force until its grievance and the claimed dereliction of its adversary have been submitted to the other contracting nations and an opportunity given them to exercise their good offices to secure a reconciliation—offices which each nation shall pledge itself to exercise.

Mr. President, to deny the efficacy of such an international pledge is to assert that there is no such thing as national honor or national sense of justice in the world. The repudiation of that false assertion has been written in the blood of millions of the bravest and truest sons of the bravest and truest nations on the face of the earth.

With such an instrument written upon the sacred altar of eternal right, dedicated to humanity and pledging the sacred honor of every mighty power, we may with justifiable reliance begin the reconstruction of a new world forever freed from the phantom of fear or the ominous clouds of a destructive war.

PURCHASE OF LOWER CALIFORNIA.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on the 2d instant I introduced a Senate resolution, which I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to open negotiations with the Republic of Mexico for the purchase of the peninsula of Lower California and for the purchase of that tract of land in the State of Sonora, Republic of Mexico, approximating in area 10,000 square miles, and lying north of the parallel of 31° 20′ N.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my first duty is to assure the Senate that this resolution is not without precedent, for I assume that upon such a serious and vital matter the Senate would not without precedent adopt such resolution. During the present session there has taken place in the Senate a most illuminating debate in which many Senators have participated, and it has been clearly pointed out that upon a number of occasions the United States Senate has passed resolutions requesting the President of the United States to negotiate treaties of various kinds. It will be recalled that on the 3d of March, 1835, the Senate passed a resolution which I now send to the desk and ask that the Secretary read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The following motion, submitted by Mr. Clayton, was considered and agreed to on March 3, 1835:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Grenada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

"Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that resolution was adopted by the Senate during the administration of President Jackson. I now send to the desk a copy of a resolution which was agreed to by the Senate on March 1, 1888, during the administration of President Cleveland. I ask that the resolution be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That, in view of the difficulties and embarrassments that have attended the regulation of the immigration of Chinese laborers to the United States under the limitations of our treaties with China, the President of the United States be requested to negotiate a treaty with the Emperor of China containing a provision that no Chinese laborer shall enter the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, history informs us that of all the Presidents who were jealous of the Executive power and authority, Presidents Jackson and Cleveland were the most. In view of the fact that the Senate did not hesitate to adopt these resolutions, during the administrations of those two Presidents, calling upon the Executive to conclude treaties, I feel that this resolution is fully justified by precedent; but if not justified by precedent it is justified by the Constitution, for the Constitution confers upon the Senate and lays upon the Senate the right and duty not only to reject treaties, to amend treaties, and to change them, but undoubtedly also the inherent right to suggest—respectfully, of course—to the Chief Executive what sort, nature, or kind of a treaty the Senate would be pleased to consider.

The peninsula of Lower California is a tongue of land which extends downwardly from the United States. It is nearly 800 miles in length, its greatest width is 150 miles, while its narrowest width is about 40 miles.

Numerous small islands and jutting rocks embroider both its Gulf coast and its Pacific coast. It is the vermiform appendix to Mexico, and by reason of its inaccessible interior, sparse settlements, and the numerous hiding places on its Pacific coast, which may upon uncomfortable occasion become points of infection and danger, it is to Mexico an appendage of doubtful value or utility.

Lower California is so isolated from the Mexican mainland and is so slimly attached to and so inaccessible to Mexico that the Mexican Government has had but little and within the past decade has had substantially no authority or jurisdiction over the peninsula. The Mexican Republic has little or no interest in the peninsula and makes no appropriations to sustain or govern the same. The Republic derives but little, indeed no revenue from this domain, which is to Mexico terra incognita. The neglect and abandonment of the peninsula by Mexico is caused by the fact that although within our own yard, the peninsula is a land of mystery, and there is a remarkable paucity of data concerning this romantic stretch of land. Its isolation from Mexico is more real and complete than the American people generally believe. To reach the peninsula from the mainland the Mexican authorities must either cross the Gulf of California, which has an average width of 200 miles, and Mexico has no ships on the Pacific side or in the Gulf, except a few fishing boats, or the Mexican expedition must journey northwesterly through the State of Sonora on the mainland and toward the mouth of the Colorado River, a distance of many hundreds of miles traversing a real desert—a desert where the raw and scorching sun comes down as a pitiless flail; where the white sand reflects the heat and glare and blinds the traveler; where no dew nor moisture is deposited during the night, and where a wind, hot as a furnace blast, usually blows from the south; where there are no roads, no trails, and no water. I am speaking of the northwestern part of the State of Sonora and not of the peninsula.

A journey over this stretch of country is dangerous and is fraught with extreme discomfort. Day after day the eye rests upon the same illimitable expanse of hot sand, with now and then a cactus lifting its arms and thorns into the brazen gloom. The loneliness and helplessness of the traveler there seem to sever him from human things and to remove him an infinite distance from the world with its interests and its occupations.

Mexico is not equipped either in wealth or progressive ideals or enterprise to penetrate and reclaim this vast and forbidding tract of country—northwestern Sonora—some of which [indicating Sonora on the map] has not been moistened by rainfall for scores of years. So we perceive that Lower California is really isolated from the Mexican Republic.

The peninsula, I repeat, is a vermiform appendix to Mexico. It is the heel—the Achilles heel—to the United States.

The Mexican Republic is both unwilling and unable to police the domain, and is unable to resist aggressions from or settlements on the peninsula by oriental powers, hence a base of supplies or of military and naval operations with comparative ease and secrecy could be established among the numerous islands on its Pacific coast.

The enforcement of law and order on the peninsula is left wholly to the governor who represented the Diaz régime, and who was and still is independent of both Gen. Carranza and Villa. The governor's moderation and prudence have given, at least, a tolerable existence to the people in Lower California. The forces at the command of the governor could present but short and feeble resistance to any effort on the part of a hostile force from the Orient, and the governor could expect and could receive no aid from the Government on the Mexican mainland.

But American industry, American money, and the American pioneer would soon turn the Colorado River upon these blistering sands; and lo! the orange tree would soon give forth its golden fruit; the lemon, the fig, and the date would flourish; and the long-staple cotton would soon spread a snow-white banner over what was once a furnace that desiccated all life, both animal and vegetable, for the American pioneer, who, although he has been silent in his wondrous achievements, has with indomitable courage transformed into smiling fields and farms every desert he has encountered.

Referring now to the Senate resolution which I have introduced, it will be observed that the Chief Executive is called upon to negotiate a treaty with Mexico for the purchase of this peninsula [indicating on a map] and for that strip of land [indicating] lying north of parallel 31° and 20′, which means that the southern boundary line of the State of Arizona would become, if the purchase were negotiated, a horizontal line from the one hundred and eleventh meridian of longitude west from Greenwich to the Gulf coast, so that the southern Arizona boundary line would be a straight line, and would proceed along the parallel of 31° and 20′ north latitude, whereas it now deflects at the one hundred and eleventh meridian and runs to the northwest to the Colorado River.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arizona a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. WATSON. Do I understand the Senator's resolution is for the purchase by this Government of Lower California?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Is there a responsible Government in Mexico which has the right to make such a sale?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, we have an ambassador in Mexico, and that Government has an ambassador here; and in international law, as the Senator from Indiana well knows, when two countries have thus received ambassadors and their credentials have been passed upon and accepted we have a right to assume, at least, that a government which can receive money is in existence. It would be a very poor and feeble government that was so feeble and so poor that it could not receive money.

Mr. WATSON. Especially Mexico.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite so.

Mr. WATSON. But while what the Senator from Arizona states is theoretically correct, the practical question is, Does the Carranza Government control Mexico at this time? Is it not a fact that that portion of Mexico is in the hands of two or three others who are at this time in a state of rebellion against it?

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure the Senator from Indiana has been out of the Chamber temporarily, because I have covered that point, but I will repeat what I have already said. For more than 10 years the Mexican Government has practically abandoned Lower California. The Federal or so-called de facto Government of Mexico receives no revenue whatever from the peninsula; it makes no appropriations whatever to govern it; it sends no ships, no troops, no soldiers, no supplies to that territory, and it receives no troops, no soldiers, and no supplies from the peninsula. The present governor of the peninsula was appointed during the Diaz régime, and his moderation and prudence have given a tolerable existence to the people there. I think that statement answers the Senator's question.

Mr. WATSON. Unfortunately, we have not very accurate information about the status of affairs in Mexico, but I have understood——

Mr. ASHURST. I am going to deal with that at a later period, if the Senator will withhold his question.

Mr. WATSON. At a later period in this speech?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; at a later period in this speech.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Iowa, of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will it require an amendment of the constitution of the Republic of Mexico to bring about a sale of that portion of its territory to the United States?

Mr. ASHURST. For many years I was under the misapprehension or at least I believed that an amendment to the Mexican constitution would be necessary in order to enable Mexico to sell a portion of her land, but I have read within recent months the Mexican constitution. That instrument does not require an amendment to the constitution under such circumstances, but, inasmuch as the constitution is amendable by the Mexican Congress, it would not be a serious thing to amend the Mexican constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the sale of their territory would require an amendment to their constitution?

Mr. ASHURST. No; because the constitution that I read was silent on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will my colleague permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have looked with some care within the last week into the constitution of Mexico of 1857 and the various amendments to that constitution up to this hour. I had been under the impression that there was a provision in the constitution that particularly inhibited the disposition of any Mexican territory, under very severe penalties and pains to him who proposed or accepted such disposition. I find in the last constitution, adopted within one or two years, that there is a provision giving the power to the Congress of the Republic to pass laws and to affix such penalties as they please in the interest of the States of the Republic of Mexico. I think that the misapprehension as to their power to dispose of their lands rests probably on some statute that may have been passed under that provision of the constitution, and I doubt not that we have been laboring under a misapprehension for many years about the limitation on the right of the Republic to dispose of its land. I can find nothing in the constitution either of 1857 or the one lately adopted to justify that impression.

Mr. CUMMINS. That means, then, from the Senator's standpoint, that if the Congress of the Republic of Mexico should authorize the sale of this portion of their territory the transfer would be a valid one.

Mr. ASHURST. That is my view of the situation. It is possible, therefore, that the Mexican Government would consider the sale of Lower California to the United States in exchange for the moneys so urgently needed by it for the rehabilitation of Mexico.

The United States would be well advised did it add to its long list of fortunate purchases this easily-to-be-made-fertile pendant of contiguous territory, and thus foreclose possible untoward eventualities.

Our diplomatic duties of the moment demand of us the most skillful employment of the opportunities which lie open to our hand, in order that we may insure ourselves and our neighbors an enduring peace.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me further, if it is not an undue interruption?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that this matter was once proposed to Carranza and was by him rejected?

Mr. ASHURST. As to that I do not know. It may have been, but the chances are that the terms were not satisfactory.

Mr. CUMMINS. But who proposed it? Who had the authority to propose anything of that kind?

Mr. WATSON. I do not think it was proposed by anybody in authority; but my understanding is that Carranza was approached for the purpose of ascertaining whether he would be willing to dispose of Lower California, and he made the statement that it was utterly impossible to do so and could not be thought of.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before I proceed to a description of the climate, the resources, the bays, and gulfs of the peninsula I wish to say generally that the United States would be well advised did it add this to its long list of fortunate Territorial purchases. It is to us easy to be made a fertile land, and every honorable attempt should be made to foreclose untoward possibilities and eventualities with respect to oriental populations that may settle and colonize Lower California.

Mr. President, American statesmen for at least three-quarters of a century have had this in mind; but one untoward event after another, one superimposed on the other, has prevented consideration of the question.

On the 5th of August, 1863, Gen. Edward Fitzgerald Beale, a very remarkable man, a great sailor on the sea and with "ships of the desert," a diplomat, and explorer, wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon P. Chase, respecting the subject, as follows:

> I am quite sure I have not exaggerated the great value to our country of that long mountain ridge which abounds in good harbors on both the Gulf coast and the Pacific and is filled with mineral wealth of every description. I beg you will give this subject a few hours' consideration. Valuable and abundantly occupied as your time is, I assure you this matter is worthy of your attention. I desire most particularly to call your attention to the fact that we have it in our power at this time by purchase of Lower California and a very small portion of the opposite coast—

He referred to the part of Sonora to which I have referred—> to possess the mouth of the Colorado, destined to be as important to us on the Pacific as is the Mississippi to the Eastern States. If the line of the Gadsden Purchase be straightened, instead of being deflected at 111 degrees of longitude, and touched the Gulf at the coast, and we should possess ourselves of Lower California, we should then control entirely the navigation of the Colorado, which the future will prove of the utmost importance to the welfare of the Pacific Coast States.

President Lincoln directed Secretary of the Treasury Chase to say to Gen. Beale that Secretary Seward would give attention to this important subject at the earliest opportunity.

The distance from Yuma to the mouth of the Colorado River as measured along the main river channel is about 105 miles. The Colorado River below Yuma changes its channel so often that its present position is quite uncertain. The distance given should therefore be considered as approximate only.

The New International Encyclopedia gives for the area of the territory of Lower California 58,328 square miles. Let me say parenthetically that I am sure from the investigations I have made for the past six years that the area is much larger than that. Its population in 1900 was about 22,572, La Paz, in the southern district, having a population of 5,536, and Ensenada, in the northern district, a population of 2,170.

Mining has undoubtedly been the principal industry of Lower California, as it has yielded some rich returns. The silver mines near La Paz are said to have been worked as early as 1700. The Boleo district at Santa Rosalia, on the east coast, is a copper camp worked by a French company (Compagnie du Boleo), and was in 1917–18 the third largest producer of copper in Mexico. Santa Rosalia is reported to have a population of 9,500. There is a large undeveloped deposit of iron ore at San Vicente, near San Quentin, on the west coast. A small shipment of manganese was made from a deposit at Mulege, on the west coast south of Santa Rosalia. Some magnesite is shipped from the west coast.

Cattle and horses are raised in the valleys, where there is water, and the southern part, which receives more rainfall and consequently is more tropical in character, has more agricultural lands than the rest. Most of the country is very arid, with practically no running water and few permanent springs. The climate in the northern and central parts is equable and healthful, resembling that of the coast region of southern California, though slightly warmer and somewhat drier than California. The country is the axis of a mountain system with peaks of 10,000 feet and elevated plateaus.

I have here some copious data which I have secured from responsible authorities within the past two days. That data I have just stated were supplied by the Geological Survey.

LOWER CALIFORNIA.

Mr. President, the Territory of Lower California is divided into two parts, the southern district, extending from the twenty-eighth parrallel to the southern end of the peninsula, and the northern district, lying between the American border and the twenty-eighth parallel. The twenty-eighth parallel divides the peninsula into two practically equal sections. The two districts are extremely different in almost every particular. The northern district bears strong resemblance to the southern part of the State of California as it was 50 years ago before the days of large irrigation projects and intensive cultivation. It has practically the same climate, the same large areas of tillable land only awaiting irrigation, timberlands in the mountains, large grazing tracts, and the same mineralogy. Toward the lower end of the district, however, the mountains become more rugged, streams disappear, the mesas and rolling lands become deserts covered with many and wonderful varieties of cacti, and human habitations are found only in the few small valleys having a constant water supply from the Sierras.

So commences the southern district, and in general the character of all that district is the same, although the mountains become smaller and its monotonous aridity is relieved by a few beautiful, fertile valleys which are veritable garden spots. These valleys or cultivated areas are the places where are found the old missions established by the Jesuit fathers in the eighteenth century and continued by the Dominicans in the early part of the nineteenth century. Indeed, it is a corollary that wherever an old mission is located water will be found hard by. The principal cultivated areas of the southern district are La Paz, the capital, San Jose del Cabo, at the extreme southern end of the peninsula, and the valleys of Hulege, Comondu, Purisima, and San Ignacio. These localities are much more thickly settled and more intensively cultivated than the developed areas of the northern district, and the southern district, as a whole, has approximately three times the population of the northern.

POPULATION OF LOWER CALIFORNIA—INDUSTRIES—PRESENT CONDITION.

There are no actual figures as to the present population of the peninsula, but from all available data it can not be more than 25,000—7,500 for the northern district and 17,500 for the southern. The only vital statistics available show 80 births and 132 deaths in the northern district during the past year. This, taken with the fact that many people have left Lower California on account of the revolution, shows conclusively that the total population is decreasing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of what is that population made up?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not that data here, but I can inform the Senator that it is nearly all made up of Mexicans, with some aborigines, and probably 6 to 7 per cent Americans.

In the south the principal industries are mining, pearl fishing, and the cultivation of tropical fruits; in the north the cultivation of wheaf, cattle ranching, and mining are the most important activities.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—WHEAT, COTTON, FRUITS.

Wheat is the principal agricultural crop grown in the northern district. It is cultivated in the valleys and on the mesas of the Pacific littoral, between latitude 31° and the American border, and in the Mexican portion of the Imperial Valley. The yield of wheat on the Pacific littoral for 1914 is shown by the following figures: Receipts by local flour mill, 47,508 bushels; exported to United States, 2,958 bushels; seed, about 6,000 bushels; on hand, about 8,000 bushels; total yield, 64,466 bushels. The wheat in the Imperial Valley was grown with barley and the yield was about 88,000 bushels (mixed), all of a very poor quality.

Practically all the flour that is used for the people there is shipped in. Sometimes, in their aboriginal way, they grind wheat, but there is hardly a flour mill in the peninsula—at least there was not two years ago.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. How many bushels of wheat did the Senator say were raised there?

Mr. ASHURST. The figures I have indicate 88,000 bushels in the Imperial Valley.

Other agricultural products of the northern district are hay and beans, but no large yield of either is obtained.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Are there any railroads there?

Mr. ASHURST. There are practically no railroads. There is a line a few miles south of the boundary line between Lower California and upper California. There is a small line there that runs for a few miles into the peninsula.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is nothing but the short line going down to a little place called Tia Juana.

Mr. ASHURST. In the Imperial Valley—the Imperial Valley lies partly in the peninsula—cotton has become very important in the last three years. In 1914 between 30,000 and 35,000 acres were planted in that section and a yield of between 25,000 and 30,000 bales of 500 pounds each obtained, with seed estimated at 1,000 pounds per bale. The cotton was picked by Chinese labor, at 75 cents gold per 100 pounds for the first and 85 cents for the second picking. It is expected that about the same acreage will be put in this year, though the failure of the cotton market has been disastrous to some of the growers.

Grain crops are not grown in the southern district of the peninsula. The agriculture of that section consists of tropical and semitropical fruits and cane. The fruits grown are grapes, figs, Arabian dates, oranges, lemons, limes, tangerines, olives, and pomegranates. Small quantites of these fruits, especially dates, are exported to the west coast of Mexico, but the greater part is consumed in the district. So far as can be learned, the yield for last year was normal, but there are no figures available as to the quantities grown.

LIVE STOCK IN NORTHERN HALF OF PENINSULA.

Cattle are raised in both the northern and southern districts of Lower California, but the industry is more important in the northern half. Here are large grazing tracts in the hills, and several American cattlemen have established profitable ranches. At times there have been between 40,000 and 50,000 head of cattle in the district, but the end of 1914 saw not more than 12,000 left, for, on account of the revolution and the prohibitive export tax imposed on cattle, the ranchers hastened to drive all the stock they could to the United States. At present this industry is as dormant as others in Lower California.

MINING THE MOST IMPORTANT INDUSTRY IN NORMAL TIMES.

In normal times the most important industry of Lower California is mining, gold, silver, and copper existing in the mountains throughout the peninsula.

FISHERIES—RESOURCES NOT ADEQUATELY EXPLOITED.

One of the most valuable resources of Lower California is the unfailing food supply in the coastal waters, but this is unexploited as far as the local population is concerned. At Magdalena Bay there is a turtle-meat and oyster cannery operated by Japanese, whose product, when the industry is developed, is destined for American and Japanese markets; and a Mexican concession for fishing along the west coast has been operated during 1914 by an American company in San Diego under a lease. The fish and lobsters—really crawfish—obtained by this company have all gone to western United States markets. Besides these two industries no attempt has been made to exploit the waters along this coast, although they abound in fish of all kinds.

UNDEVELOPED RESOURCES OF LOWER CALIFORNIA.

The peninsula of Lower California has always been to the average American an unknown land. To the popular imagination it is a barren country noted chiefly for its deserts and cactus growths. In a sense this is true as applied to the central southern section, but the northern district is a world apart and has resources which, if lying in the United States, would be worth millions. The world knows about the orange and lemon groves of California, but few realize that immediately to the south of that garden spot lies a country just as fertile, but out of the frost belt, with thousands of barren acres only waiting water to grow in abundance almost any known crop.

OPPORTUNITY AND NECESSITY FOR IRRIGATION—PROJECT BY BRITISH CAPITALISTS.

The problem of Lower California is to bring the water to the land. In the valleys and on the mesas between the mountains and the Pacific Ocean there are 450,000 acres of potentially rich and uncultivated land. Scattered about this same section are 15,000 acres of cultivated land, only 500 acres of which are irrigated. These 500 acres are on a ranch near Ensenada, and the irrigated area is devoted to Lima beans, with an excellent annual yield.

Most of the best irrigable land referred to lies to the east and to the northeast of San Quentin. A project involving the expenditure of millions by British capitalists was being considered as late as 1913, but the unsettled conditions in Mexico have prevented any action being taken. This project contemplated a dam across the Santo Domingo River, on the western slope of the San Pedro Martir Range, and it is believed to have been a perfectly feasible undertaking. There are other opportunities for the conservation and distribution of water in the district, and it is on the future materialization of these that the hope of all agricultural development lies. It should be remembered that while the average rainfall along the coast is between 9 and 10 inches, the fall in the mountains is between 20 and 30 inches, not to mention the winter snows that cover the higher mountains. Yet nearly all of this water is lost, either flooding the rivers in the rainy season and running out to sea or sinking into the ground and disappearing before it gets down to the arable land.

MINING NOT PROPERLY DEVELOPED—TIMBER THAT IS STILL UNTOUCHED.

In mining, the resources of the district have been barely scratched. Alamo, a great mining camp of the early nineties, is deserted and yet it was never really developed. Several millions of dollars were taken out of Alamo and still the shafts did not go below the 350-foot level, and the mother lode—which all mining men knowing the place agree must exist—was never found. The San Fernando copper deposits have never been exhausted. There is copper there to-day in quantities to pay well for its exploitation. Besides these there are many places where gold, silver, copper, iron, sulphur, and semiprecious stones have been found in paying quantities, and there are to-day many embryo mines that some day must and will be developed. In addition to that, Mr. President, the timber resources in the high mountain ranges are very considerable.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Can the Senator tell us the character of the timber?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes. There is pine timber on the slopes of San Pedro Martir and on the mountains north of Alamo that must some day be taken to market. The following statement is an excerpt from a report made by Col. D. K. Allen in 1887 to the old International Co.—owning large land concessions—on the timber region of San Pedro Martir:

Large trees per acre, 25; small trees per acre, 10; average number of logs per tree, 3; average diameter of each, 2 feet 9 inches; length of logs, 12 feet.

Number of Norway pine per acre, 17; number of white pine per acre, 4; number of fir trees per acre, 3; number of red cedar per acre, 1; total, 25.

Number of dead trees per acre, 3; number of trees down per acre, 2.

Total number of Norway pine trees, 8,500,000; total number of white pine trees, 2,000,000; total number of fir trees, 1,500,000; total number of red cedar trees, 500,000; total number of trees on San Pedro, 12,500,000.

Total number of logs on San Pedro, 37,500,000; total number of feet of lumber, 18,750,000,000; total cords of wood (4 feet), 200,000,000; total number of small trees, 5,000,000.

Average fall of snow, 4 to 8 feet; average time it lies on ground, 4 to 20 weeks.

That is, of course, in the mountains in the southern part of the peninsula. The average rainfall in the summer is 20 to 30 inches. While I am speaking of rainfall, let me say that in the part of Sonora embraced within my resolution there is probably less rainfall than in any other part of North America. In the part of Sonora which I have indicated here—the northwestern part—the rainfall is about 2 inches per year, and, in fact, there are vast tracts where rain has not fallen for scores of years.

Adverting to the head of the Gulf of California at Puerto Isabel, which is two and a half miles above the mouth of the Santa Clara, there is a good landing place. About 2 miles above this point is a place called Shipyard. It is not shown on any map. There are a few frame buildings there. The Santa Clara River is in the vicinity of the mouth of the Colorado, and is at the northern part of the Gulf of California. South of Puerto Isabel there is a good landing place at Puerto Resugio, where there are two fine harbors, with good anchorage, sheltered from all winds. Those harbors would both be within the United States should the Chief Executive conclude a treaty with Mexico for the purchase of this tract of land, about 10,000 square miles in area, lying to the southwest of Arizona.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. Do I understand that the Senator by resolution seeks to begin negotiations with Mexico for the acquisition by purchase, and with the approval of the residents, of that district?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, Mr. President. My resolution is a very simple one. It is a Senate resolution calling upon the President "to open negotiations with the Republic of Mexico for the purchase of the peninsula of Lower California, and for the purchase of that tract of land" in the northwestern part of Sonora, Mexico. Yes, Mr. President; the resolution simply, solely, and only calls upon the President to bring into requisition the literary and diplomatic resources of the State Department and peaceably and honorably to purchase from Mexico this vast tract of land. There is no thought of aggression, no suggestion of seizure or the grabbing of land, but the purchase of land just as the United States has for a century or more honorably purchased lands as it felt it needed them, and as other countries felt they wished to dispose of them.

Mr. PHELAN. Do I understand, then, that it would be purely voluntary on the part of Mexico, and that the territory is of no value to Mexico?

Mr. ASHURST. The territory, by reason of a series of circumstances, which I will set out later, is of no value to Mexico. Mexico has not our enterprise. It is sluggish, and the tract of land there is of no value to Mexico. If it remains in Mexican possession, it will be the same 100 years from to-day as it is to-day, a dreary, barren waste; whereas American money, American spirit, American enterprise, can make it into gardens and farms, and a blessing to civilization.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know that the Senator intends to bring out the strategic value of Lower California. I have in mind the fact that when California was acquired from Mexico, several foreign powers—notably Great Britain and France—had plotted to acquire the territory, which would have cut us off in our continental expansion from the Pacific. The policy of the United States then was not to take the territory, although she had the power to take it, but to prevent any other power from taking it. After the declaration of war with Mexico there was, indeed, a contest between the United States and Great Britain, resulting in a race between the American ship Savannah and the British ship Collingwood, to see which should first reach the capital of California, at Monterey, to raise the flag; so by a mere accident we are in possession of that territory. The United States could not suffer foreign powers to occupy the Pacific coast. I recall, and I wish simply to direct the attention of the Senator to the fact, that not long ago the Japanese, by negotiation—because there has been a great deal of intrigue between the island Empire and the Mexicans—were endeavoring to get a foothold in Lower California, and it was only stopped by the Lodge resolution, passed by this body, declaring that this Government would regard the colonization by any foreign Government directly or indirectly by its citizens as an unfriendly act to the United States. Now, there is always the danger of colonization by other nations and of acquisition by secret treaties or otherwise, inspired by Zimmermann letters or otherwise. Hence, it is a matter of great strategic importance; but I would not think, unless by the free act of Mexico, that the United States should conspire to take that territory.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from California has made a very serious statement regarding Japan. I should like to ask him if he speaks by the record; if he is positive of the fact that these negotiations, or attempted negotiations, were pending or entered into by Japan?

My reason for doing this is that, if my recollection serves me aright, the Japanese Government at the time denied that fact, and did it officially; and if, as a matter of fact, that denial was not a sincere one, then the Senator's statement might become of the utmost diplomatic importance.

Mr. PHELAN. There is always a hesitancy in this body, I know, to discuss international relations in open session, but it seems that this is the period of open diplomacy. I would ask that there be spread upon the records the Lodge resolution, which speaks for itself. In a previous discussion in this body I raised the point that the Lodge resolution was directed against the threatened aggression by Japanese colonists in this very same matter, affecting Lower California. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said that Japan was not mentioned in his resolution; and then I directly interrogated him, and said, "Had you not Japan in your mind when you introduced the resolution and when the Senate passed it?" and he said yes. Japan was the only country spoken of at that time. That is an open secret.

I do not say, nor did he say, that the Japanese Government itself had made this aggressive step, but that Japanese merchants and colonizers had sought the acquisition of a large tract of land around Magdalena Bay, which is a highly desirable acquisition for our naval operations—that is another open secret—and that therefore the Japanese, through their merchants or through their colonizers, must be held responsible. It is not by any involvement of the Japanese Government that this matter has come to the surface; but American citizens might in some other country have made an attempt to acquire land contrary to the proprietary rights or the peace and contentment of a foreign country, and protests might be made to this Government against the acts of its citizens; and this Government could, I think, by the exercise of its authority, prevent its citizens, against such a protest, from acquiring or seeking to acquire such territory. In a much greater degree the Japanese Government has control over its nationals, and I do not know that the Japanese Government took any action after the passage of the Lodge resolution. All I know is that their merchants or colonizers desisted from the attempt.

I do not wish at this time to bring up any matter which would in any way mar the entente cordiale which exists between the nations seeking a settlement of greater questions in other parts of the world; nor do I desire to say that the State of California is interested in this matter at all. All I know of it is what has come from the speech of the Senator from Arizona, who introduced the resolution, and I do not know that it is timely at this moment to discuss the proposition; but since it is before the Senate it is well that the circumstances surrounding the Lodge resolution should be known, if not authenticated. I am sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts is not here.

Mr. PHELAN subsequently said: Mr. President, on December 12, 1916, during the discussion of the immigration bill, the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] said that the Magdalena Bay resolution which bore my name mentioned the Japanese by name. I knew it did not, but I thought it was just as well to read it into the RECORD:

"Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American Continents is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States the Government of the United States could not see without grave concern the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such a relation to another government not American as to give that government practical power of control for national purposes."

No name is mentioned.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, whereas no name has been mentioned, of course the Senator will not deny that he intended to refer to the Japanese.

Mr. LODGE. I have not referred to any Government. Of course the Japanese Government was the one that had been mentioned in that connection. Other governments had also been mentioned.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly do not want to interrupt the Senator from Arizona, who is making a most interesting speech. I merely wish to say that I have no desire to shrink from a public discussion of our diplomatic relations with any country. I simply called attention to the fact that my recollection was that the Japanese Government had officially contradicted the rumors and statements which were made, and some of which were quite current immediately preceding the introduction and passage of the Lodge resolution.

So far as the general proposition is concerned, there is no difference between us. I do not think the United States ought to permit any country—Japan or some smaller or weaker nationality—to obtain any foothold whatever upon the littorals of the Pacific Ocean, or indeed upon the shores of any ocean bounding the Western Hemisphere. That can be said to be almost the universal opinion, I think, of Americans everywhere.

I am much obliged to the Senator for permitting this interruption.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks a statement from the Department of Agriculture concerning the rainfall in certain portions of the country under discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POLLOCK in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, as the Senator has been interrupted, I should like to ask how many inhabitants there are in this territory which he proposes to purchase?

Mr. ASHURST. Let me answer the Senator's question as follows:

In that part of the State of Sonora comprehended in this resolution, the northwestern part, it is very difficult to determine how many, or perhaps I should say how few, persons there are; probably 500. My judgment is that there are not that many; but in the peninsula, which is nearly 800 miles long and has an average width of 100 miles, there are in the northern district about 7,500 persons and in the southern district about 17,500, or 25,000 in all—not as many as there were 25 years ago; not as many, in fact, as there were 10 years ago.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the Senator if he contemplates that in carrying out this action, if it is done, the policy of self-determination would be invoked?

Mr. ASHURST. Personally, Mr. President, I am very strongly of the opinion that the views, wishes, and desires of those persons inhabiting the country proposed to be purchased should be taken into consideration; and it must be assumed—indeed, I am sure that every Senator here would assume—I never would have introduced the resolution had I not been quite certain, from my study of the question for six years past, that the sentiment is practically unanimous for admission and annexation to the United States. Strange as it may seem, since I introduced the resolution, which was only on the second of this month, I have received nearly 1,200 letters on this project, and I know of but one that is opposed to it. I will ask leave to have read now part of a letter I have received from one of the most prominent men in the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that he has received that number of letters from the inhabitants of the country?

Mr. ASHURST. No; but from inhabitants of the United States who are familiar with the sentiments and familiar with the views of the people in the territory sought to be acquired. I will ask the Secretary to read this excerpt, because it is characteristic of a large number of letters I have received from people who are familiar with that district.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

I note your introduction of a resolution requesting the President to begin negotiations with the Mexican Republic for the purchase of the Lower California Peninsula and all that portion of the Mexican State of Sonora lying north of the parallel 31° 20′ north latitude, and, as a citizen, wish to express my cordial approval of your proposal.

I am somewhat familiar, by personal observation, with the great possibilities of the Lower California Peninsula in the development of its mineral wealth, its fisheries, and, to a limited extent, agriculture. The importance of the magnificent harbor of Magdalena Bay has been so often emphasized that it is usually the first argument advanced for the acquisition of the peninsula by the United States, but its natural resources, its practically complete isolation geographically from the remainder of the Mexican Republic, and the sparseness of its population at present, all make your proposal most advantageous and feasible for the United States and no particular loss to Mexico. In fact, I am led to believe that the majority of the inhabitants of the peninsula would welcome annexation to the United States. United States currency is the principal medium of exchange in circulation in that territory at the present time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a very able Senator has just remarked sotto voce—and he is thoughtful in it—that if I am not careful I will make out this tract of country so valuable that Mexico will not part with it. Now, that is only an apparent danger. Mexico is almost a derelict. It is not offensive to a sister nation to say that, because it is a fact. It has about the same chance of floating into a harbor as the ordinary derelict out on the physical ocean has, and Mexico needs help. She needs not only good advice but credits as well. But howsoever valuable this district—this peninsula—may be, it is not valuable to Mexico. It is only a vermiform appendix to Mexico—a source of danger. She can not appreciate its value. Mexico has not that stimulus of the progressive ideals that the American pioneer has. It may be valuable to us, but not to Mexico. When the first European set his foot on these shores, the mines were just as rich as they are to-day; the forests and the fields and the noble and placid harbors and rivers were there, but the dominating, pulsating spirit of civilization had to enter to make it valuable. It is valuable, yes, in natural resources, but it will never be valuable to Mexico.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am wondering if the Senator thinks we will have as much success in colonizing and developing Lower California as we have had in the case of Alaska, which we have owned for more than 50 years; and yet it was stated yesterday, before a committee of which I am a member, that there were less than half the number of inhabitants there to-day that there were two years ago.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How about Texas?

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to add to the Senator's statement that the great bulk of Alaska has been withdrawn from public settlement.

Mr. WEEKS. I know the reason for it, of course.

Mr. THOMAS. It is being held for posterity.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is being conserved for eternity.

Mr. ASHURST. But is there a Senator, is there a Member of the House, who would vote to return Alaska? No. Secretary Seward—a man of great vision and large grasp of public affairs—at midnight learned that he could conclude a treaty for the purchase of Alaska, and before the sun gilded the eastern sky the next morning he and the Russian minister concluded the treaty. At that time distinguished men opposed the project in the strongest possible terms. I will read some of their statements.

Mr. Orange Ferriss, of New York, said:

The people of this country do not want these Russian possessions. If submitted to them they would reject the treaty by a majority of millions. Alaska, with the Aleutian Islands, is an inhospitable, wretched, and God-forsaken region, worth nothing, but a positive injury and encumbrance as a colony of the United States.

Mr. Washburne, of Wisconsin, said:

The country is absolutely without value. * * * I tell gentlemen who go for Alaska that Greenland to-day is a better purchase than Alaska. * * *

Mr. Hiram Price, of Iowa, said:

Now that we have got it and can not give it away or lose it, I hope we will keep it under military rule and get along with as little expense as possible. It is a dead loss to us anyway, and the more expense we incur the worse it is for the country and the people.

Mr. B. F. Butler, of Massachusetts, July 7, 1868, said:

If we are to pay for her (Russia's) friendship this amount, I desire to give her the $7,200,000 and let her keep Alaska. * * * I have no doubt that any time within the last 20 years we could have had Alaska for the asking. I have heard it was so stated in the Cabinets of two Presidents, provided we would have taken it as a gift. But no man, except one insane enough to buy the earthquakes in St. Thomas and the ice fields in Greenland, could be found to agree to any other terms for its acquisition to the country.

Mr. Benjamin F. Loan, of Missouri, said:

The acquisition of this inhospitable and barren waste would never add one dollar to the wealth of our country or furnish homes to our people. To suppose that anyone would willingly leave the mild climate and fruitful soil of the United States, with its newspapers and churches, its railroads and commerce, its civilization and refinement, to seek a home among the Aleuts * * * is simply to suppose such person insane.

Mr. Williams, of Pennsylvania, said:

Have the people desired it? (The purchase of Alaska.) Not a sensible man among them had ever suggested it. The whole country exclaimed at once, when it was made known to it, against the ineffable folly, if not the wanton profligacy, of the whole transaction. There is no man here, I think, who would have advised it. I doubt whether there are 20 in this House who would be willing to vote for it now, but for the single reason that the contract has been made.

Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, January 13, 1869—after the Territory had been purchased, speaking on the bill to provide a government for the same—said:

The accounts which we receive from that Territory of the sickness and suffering of the people who are sent there show conclusively that it will never be inhabited to any considerable extent by white men.

Mr. Ferriss, of New York, speaking on the same bill, moved to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the President be authorized to bind the United States by treaty to pay the sum of $7,200,000 to any respectable European, Asiatic, or African power which will accept a cession of the Territory of Alaska.

One statesman after another inveighed against the purchase of Alaska, and yet it has been a most remarkably fortunate purchase. Instead of "Seward's folly" and "Seward's ice box," no greater domain than Alaska was ever acquired by honorable statesmanship.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I want to add there, also, that a good deal of the objection to the purchase of Alaska was due to unfamiliarity with its value. The Senator of course remembers that Mr. Webster, one of America's greatest statesmen, declared upon the floor of this Chamber that the Rocky Mountains were a barrier that had been created by the Almighty for the protection of Anglo-Saxon civilization; that the country lying to the west of the Rocky Mountain range consisted of icebergs and sand banks, barren mountains and plains and deserts, inhospitable to a population of any kind, and that there was not a decent harbor upon the Pacific coast; and I think he added that he would not give a dollar for the whole of Oregon. Certainly an eminent statesman like Mr. Webster making assertions of that kind rather excuses the repetition of similar statements in regard to other sections of the continent. We all know better now.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not wish the Senator from Arizona to think from my inquiry that I am hostile to what he is proposing, but I did intend to reflect on the vision and on the legislation of Congress which has been enacted in connection with the development of Alaska. I think it is a serious reflection on the American Congress that that great country, with its great values, is so tied up that it can not be successfully developed.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree with the Senator on that. We are not in disagreement at all on that point.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator to the extent of discussing the matter that has just been mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts. I merely wish to remark, however, that there are very large areas of rich land in Alaska which have been surveyed by the General Land Office and are open for homestead, and there are some advantages in connection with it in comparison with homesteads in the continental United States. In Alaska a man can take 320 acres as a homestead. There is something else wrong with the situation in Alaska besides the question of locking up the land or the resources. A great number of settlers went upon the rich lands that I have referred to and took up homesteads. A few of them are there yet, but a large number of them have come out. It is not because the lands are locked up, but for other reasons, the discussion of which I shall reserve for some future occasion.

Mr. ASHURST. Whatever be the reason, the purchase of Alaska was an honorable purchase, and at that time it was generally believed that Russia had the best of the bargain. But the world knows that the timber, gold, coal, oil, and I will say furs, in Alaska are practically inexhaustible; and no doubt, under improved methods and intensive farming, Alaska will yet be a great agricultural country and an apple country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. When we bought Alaska it was practically all public domain. Can the Senator from Arizona inform the Senate with regard to Lower California, how much of the territory is public domain; or, in other words, how much of it has passed into private ownership?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not a map here showing the grants. Let me answer the Senator by saying that when the treaty of Guadelupe Hidalgo was concluded with Mexico there was a provision that valid grants which had previously been made, whether the grantees deraigned title from Spain or from Mexico, should be recognized. All over California there were vast grants of land the titles to which have been held inviolate in the grantee and his heirs and successors. The Spanish Government and the Mexican Government made grants. There were some grants in my own State.

There are some grants that have been made to vast tracts in Lower California. I am speaking now without accurate information, but I would judge that the grants that have been made do not embrace and cover over 15 per cent of the area of the peninsula, and there are no grants except two very small ones here [indicating Sonora on the map] covering that part of Sonora.

Mr. CUMMINS. I gave some study to the subject a short while ago, and I think the Senator from Arizona is rather underestimating the area of the lands which have been granted either by Spain or by some government of Mexico to private persons or corporations. But I am not suggesting this because I am opposed to the resolution. In fact, I have long been of the opinion that we ought to try hard to buy it, and if we could not buy it we ought to take it; but that would not be in accord with the universal brotherhood of man and the reign of justice which is now supposed to prevail throughout the world.

I was reminded of the fact that a large part of the valuable territory of Lower California was in private ownership by the suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN]. The truth is that after the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] introduced his resolution which related to Magdalena Bay it developed in the course of the debate that the land around Magdalena Bay and which it was feared might fall into the hands of Japanese subjects was actually owned by American citizens, and the fear was that American citizens owning the vast concessions might part with them to Japanese citizens or subjects. That makes it all the more necessary that if possible we should control Lower California.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his interruption. When we come to consider the land grants made by Mexico it is quite a serious task to examine the titles. There is a man in my town who spoke about a "Mexican airplane propeller," and he said that we ought to have it, as the propeller made 10,000 revolutions a minute. They have a great many revolutions in Mexico. Possibly the de facto government to-day will make a grant and another government to-morrow will revoke it and make another grant, but when you come to valid, substantive grants that eminent lawyers, such as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and other Senators, would go into their law offices, study, and then say were valid and legal grants, I should say but 15 or 20 per cent of the area of Lower California is included in such grants.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Something of that kind I had in mind awhile ago when I suggested to the Senator if we would buy Lower California we might buy trouble. My understanding is that Mexico to-day is probably in as serious an internal condition as she has ever been; that there is seething revolution in 14 of her 27 States; that Carranza controls only a limited portion of Mexico, and that other generals are in control of other portions of Mexico. If some rebel general in arms against the Carranza Government is in control of the part of Mexico that lies next to Lower California, and we were to take over Lower California, would we not be taking over a fight?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator's question has arisen, but I am assuming, and I think I have a right to assume, that when our State Department brings its diplomatic, literary, and historical resources to work on this question, the department would take pains to conclude a treaty that would preclude all reasonable fear of trouble with Mexico. Doubtless there would be some junta in Mexico that might be considerable in number that would oppose the treaty. If they could make themselves felt in the Mexican Congress they could defeat the ratification of the treaty, but I do not believe it would be a concern of ours if we made an honest purchase with clean hands and paid a fair, substantial sum of money to the appropriate persons who were the de facto and acting authority.

Mr. WATSON. But this is the question, to further pursue it: It is not that we could not make a treaty with Carranza, inasmuch as we have a representative there and his Government has a representative here, both duly accredited. Therefore, we could make a binding, valid treaty. It is not that, but Carranza himself is unable to take possession, I understand, of Lower California. There are roving bands of guerrillas and brigands, or there are generals in command of these roving armies. Villa is down there on that coast somewhere, and Felix Dias is down there somewhere, and half a dozen other fellows at the head of those bands. If Carranza, at this time President of Mexico, is unable to control that portion of the country, how could he give us a warranty deed for it and then defend it as against those people?

Mr. ASHURST. The Federal Government of Mexico for more than 10 years has not pretended to have any authority or jurisdiction over it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Mexican Government owns it.

Mr. ASHURST. The Mexican Government, as my colleague says, however, owns it.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; that is all there is in it.

Mr. ASHURST. That to me is an objection so hazy and so nebulous that I hardly consider it as an objection. I believe as Andrew Jackson believed, that we can deal with de facto governments. They may have a new government every day, but that is not our concern. I would deal with the de facto government if I knew it would change to-morrow. We have a right under the law of nations to deal with the de facto government, although it may be supplanted to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. In other words, here is what I want to find out from the Senator. He would make a treaty with Mexico, if he could make a satisfactory treaty, to take over the territory and then go and take it regardless of consequences.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly, so long as the will of Mexico were not overthrown and no injustice practiced, and there was no deception. Does the Senator think that because a few cutthroats and outlaws who neither know nor respect the law of Mexico nor the law of the United States objected that our Federal Government should withhold any action simply because a few bandits object to civilization and law and order?

Mr. WATSON. No, Mr. President, the Senator believes just as I do, except that I have been trying to get him to say it.

Mr. ASHURST. I have just said it.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely. I would long ago have protected American property and American life and American interests in Mexico.

Mr. ASHURST. I said here long ago if I had charge of affairs Mexican outlaws there would get grapeshot instead of grape juice. I said that long ago, but I am not in charge of the State Department.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. Does it not seem to the Senator that it would be well for us to pay the Republic of Colombia for what we took from her before we go to buying other territory?

Mr. ASHURST. I am in thorough accord with the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and with the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in their views that we ought to pay Colombia for the territory we took. I am not a believer in the idea that because we are great, powerful, and opulent we ought to take territory by the strong arm. We ought to buy what we wish to acquire.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. CUMMINS. What are we buying from Mexico? If a very large part of that valuable territory is in the ownership of private persons, what do we buy from the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. ASHURST. We buy the sovereignty.

Mr. CUMMINS. We can not buy the sovereignty. How can we pay for sovereignty? Sovereignty, of course, is power, for it depends upon the will of the persons who are in power.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is a statesman whose just fame is known in every portion of this land. The Senator knows we bought Florida, we acquired Louisiana by purchase, we annexed Texas, we made the Gadsden Purchase, and in each there were large private interests involved. In the case of California, a large part of that State was in private ownership in the shape of land grants.

Mr. CUMMINS. There was a time in the development of the world in civilization in which sovereignty was bought, and I am not particularly critical about that, because it was in harmony with the thought at that time, but nowadays we do not look upon the purchase of mere sovereignty as a very appropriate thing. In all the other purchases mentioned by the Senator from Arizona while there were private interests there was very large public property as well. Take the Louisiana Purchase. There comparatively few people were on a great public domain. I was wondering whether the Senator from Arizona had in his mind to pay Mexico for the full value of all the property in Lower California.

Mr. ASHURST. Well, of course, I am asking the Senate to pass the resolution requesting the President to negotiate a treaty. If I were Secretary of State, I might negotiate one sort of a treaty and somebody else might negotiate another sort of a treaty, but the question of the right of purchase of domain by the United States is well settled. It was settled in the Louisiana Purchase that the United States has a right to purchase territory and to erect that territory into States later on. We purchased the Danish West Indies only a year or two ago. These purchases afford an abundant precedent and example and authority for the purchase of this domain.

Before I leave this question, let me say, in reply to the question by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], that I do not wish to be understood as inferring that there is a vast deal of lawlessness and disorder in the peninsula. On the contrary, under a rather moderate, beneficent, and prudent administration of the present governor there, considering the people that he has to deal with do not always understand law and order, there is remarkable tranquillity, considering that it is a part of Mexico, because Mexico implies the very reverse of tranquillity.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think there is any question about that part of it; but the point I was making is that Carranza is in a very precarious condition now, with all these revolutions surging about him, and the probabilities are that he would not be willing to make a treaty, and if he did it would occasion another insurrection and another revolution and more trouble.

Mr. ASHURST. What are a few insurrections, more or less, in Mexico?

Mr. WATSON. Not of the slightest importance on earth; but the point I am considering is that if we start then we shall have to finish the job.

Mr. ASHURST. Would that be difficult?

Mr. WATSON. No; it would be entirely agreeable to me; and I am trying to get the Senator from Arizona to make a bold declaration of it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. To go into denunciation of Mexico?

Mr. WATSON. No; not a denunciation of Mexico; but in the way of protecting American interests and American life and property in Mexico we have not done what we ought to have done.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If you proceed along that line and go into that discussion at this particular time, I claim to know something about that border down there.

Mr. WATSON. I have no doubt the Senator does.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I really know something of the relations of Mexico to our people down there. If you are in an effort to beat the resolution by raising a denunciation on this floor, an adverse criticism against men who think they are responding to a very unjust action on our part, you may succeed in raising such a spirit there that the end which we are trying to accomplish may be dissipated in the very start.

Mr. WATSON. I want to say to the Senator that I am not attempting to defeat the resolution at all. I am simply trying to follow to its logical conclusion the argument of the Senator's colleague who is advancing this proposition. We are having constant trouble in Mexico. The Senator knows about that. How many soldiers are there to-day on guard along the border of Mexico?

Mr. ASHURST. If you had 40,000 you might not have too many. What is the use to get off into a discussion of another question? I am willing to admit, and no candid man will deny, that neither life nor property has been safe in Mexico for many years. Is not that a bold declaration?

Mr. WATSON. That is satisfactory.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator now be bold enough, I know he is honest enough, to admit there is a de facto government in Mexico with which the United States could deal under international law?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. There is a de facto government in Mexico with which all nations may honorably deal. I am asking the Senate to adopt a resolution looking to an honest and fair purchase from the de facto government of a tract of land that we need and that is valuable to us and that is not worth anything to Mexico. I hope now the underbrush is all cleared away in this debate. Why is the peninsula valuable to us? I have spoken of its magnificent harbor, Magdalena Bay, on the Pacific coast, and of the Bay of La Paz on its Gulf coast. It has numerous islands on the Pacific and the Gulf coast where an oriental enemy could colonize and set up a naval base or a military base. Mexico is unable, unwilling to resist.

Magdalena Bay is valuable to us. The Panama Canal, built by American enterprise, will become, when reconstruction shall have been over, the stream of great currents of trade with the Orient. Is it not timely and proper that American statesmen, American Senators, should give consideration to a proposition which puts American possession 800 miles nearer the Panama Canal? The Panama Canal is the very pentralia of our peace and security. Just so it is unthinkable that American Senators would permit such a valuable—I might say invaluable—asset as the Panama Canal to be inadequately secured against seizure and against destruction.

The canal is open to the world upon the same terms, but the duty is on us nevertheless to guard and control the canal.

The Pacific Ocean is a theater of activity that the most remote excursion of the imaginatior can not describe—a theater of commerce, perhaps a theater of war. Who dares to say what it will not be in the future? It should be our part and our duty as American citizens to guard the Pacific in every way. When the fleet went around the world in 1908 it stopped at Magdalena Bay to test its guns by target practice in that magnificent harbor. Mexico does not want Magdalena Bay, can not use it, does not appreciate it. The Mexicans have not the stimulus that Americans have and never will appreciate it. Are we, therefore, to sit here year in and year out because we have hesitancy about dealing with a de facto government? I am not afraid, I will say to the Senator, to deal with a de facto authority. Their acts are valid. I am afraid, however, to do an injustice or a wrong. I am afraid to take it; not but what we could get it; they could offer but a feeble resistance, but a fair man is afraid to do wrong.

Now, there is another vital point in this question. It is seldom appreciated. It is very little investigated. It involves the control of the great Colorado River, the Nile of the West. The Colorado sends down each year 17,000,000 acre-feet of water. What do I mean by that? I mean it sends down enough water each year to cover 17,000,000 acres with water 1 foot deep. During the period from 1903 to 1914, 215,000,000 acre-feet of water in the Colorado River passed Hardyville, Ariz. The Colorado River is called the Nile of the West. The Nile has 68,000,000 acre-feet of water coming down each year. The Colorado has 17,000,000 acre-feet of water coming down each year. The Nile, therefore, has four times more water than has the Colorado. The Nile basin has three times the area the Colorado basin has, but the Colorado River is doing only one-fifteenth the irrigation that the Nile is doing. There is the Nile, with only four times more water, with only three times more irrigable land—the land is about the same in character—doing fifteen times more irrigating than the Colorado. To obtain the same amount of irrigation per acre-foot as the Nile the Colorado should irrigate eight times what it is now irrigating—eight times 300,000, or 2,400,000 acres.

So, Mr. President, if a treaty can be concluded for the purchase of this tract of land on the northwestern coast of Sonora and the peninsula of Lower California, 2,000,000 acres more of land so rich that no industrious man needs over 40 acres of it to become opulent may be irrigated. The Deglet Noor dates, worth $2 a pound, and the long-staple cotton, which my distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has seen and will say measures up and staples with the best cotton in the world, the orange, the lemon, the lime—all the fruits and flowers could be grown there; whereas if Mexico retains it it will be a howling desert, a cactus-infested land.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Just let me finish the sentence.

Therefore, is it surprising that I urge the President to conclude a treaty for the honest purchase of this land? We speak of our soldiers coming home, and of providing land for the soldiers, a very worthy movement. The lands must be obtained somewhere. If the Colorado River, with its 10,000,000 acre-feet of water now running to waste each year, can have its waters turned out on this fertile land can you imagine anything more romantic and yet more practical than the making of this desert to bloom with flowers and fruit and with the environments of a refined civilization? I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has perhaps done so, but if not I hope he will emphasize the fact that the utilization of this water to the extent he has described necessitates the construction of improvements upon Mexican soil. I think that is the point of divergence.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the very point.

Mr. THOMAS. The Imperial Valley, therefore, is very largely dependent upon Mexican good will, or cooperation, if you please, or both, for its continued prosperity, its water coming from the Colorado River.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has stated it so succinctly that I need not refer to it further, except to say that he is absolutely correct. Some parts of Imperial Valley, where the agricultural crop is worth more than $100,000,000 annually, lie in the extreme northern part of the peninsula.

Irrigationists in the peninsula are dependent upon the moderation of the governor, whom I have just described three times as being a prudent man. I will not say that he desires or will be glad to see the annexation of the peninsula to the United States, because I have no authority to say that, but I believe it just the same.

Mr. President, passing on from the point I tried to make, of the necessity of controlling the territory of the Colorado River, it is a snow-fed river, as is the Nile; it rises in June and July; it would be necessary to have storage dams some 200 miles up the river to gather in and conserve and hold this vast quantity of water that rushes and wastes itself in the gulf. This affords another reason why we should pass the resolution. It affords another reason why the executive branch of the Government should conclude a treaty with Mexico looking toward the acquisition of this land. This is not a new subject. It has been a subject of frequent discussion, of diplomatic negotiations and otherwise.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps the Senator has stated it, but I would be glad if he would state again about the length of the peninsula.

Mr. ASHURST. The length of the peninsula is about 800 miles. Its greatest width is 150 miles; its narrowest point is 40 miles, and its average width is about 100 miles.

Mr. FLETCHER. There are harbors on the Pacific side?

Mr. ASHURST. On the Pacific side there are several harbors, and there is the very famous Magdalena Bay Harbor. On the gulf side there is a remarkably fine harbor in the southern portion of the peninsula, La Paz.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the depth of the water at Magdalena Bay?

Mr. ASHURST. I have never been there, but I am informed that any sort of ships now built may dock in Magdalena Harbor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand there are over 45 feet of water there.

Mr. ASHURST. Now, Mr. President, one other question. We stand before the world with all nations seeking our favor because of what we may call our magnanimity and our patriotism. We have stridently asserted—I think the word is correct—that we are the friends of Mexico. All right. Let us see whether or not we are at heart. Mexico—torn, distracted, almost a shipwreck among the nations, overrun by bandits and cutthroats, with only a small percentage of population understanding the blessings of freedom, misled in large part by German propaganda—is a nation that should excite our sympathy as much as it ought to incur our just displeasure.

We are the friends of Mexico, we say. What does Mexico need most of all? She has all the law that can be imagined. Name a law that Mexico has not. Laws alone do not make a nation. Ideals, justice, moderation, frugality, sobriety, order, and industry make a nation. The stimulus of gold and enterprise makes a nation. Mexico needs money. She needs money to pay the interest on her bonded indebtedness. She has an enormous floating indebtedness. I do not pretend to assert how many millions of dollars Mexico owes the United States for lives and property of persons destroyed in the United States by Mexicans. I will not even venture upon the still larger question of trying to determine how much money Mexico owes citizens of the United States for the destruction of life and property in Mexico; but with the stimulus of the money that she will receive from this purchase she can pay the interest on her national debt, discharge or liquidate at least a part of the obligations she owes to our citizens. She may then rebuild her railroad bridges, build boats, and set herself aright before the great family of nations, and to discharge one's obligations is the most substantial way of setting one's self right. Mexico needs the stimulus which American enterprise and American money honestly paid to her can give her.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I simply want to ask whether, in the opinion of the Senator from Arizona, the pride—proper pride, perhaps—in which Mexico indulges to-day will not be so great that they will wipe aside all of these incentives to sell and refuse to sell, for the present, at least?

Mr. ASHURST. Well, the Mexicans are a very proud people, and I for one am inclined to respect their punctilious pride; but I am convinced that it is within the diplomatic and the literary resources not only of the present Secretary of State, but the Secretaries of State whom we have had, and those who are to come afterwards, to negotiate, in time, a treaty with Mexico looking toward that end. It will not be an easy task; undoubtedly it will be a difficult task; it is not impossible of accomplishment, and we should never stop; but with all proper insistence, and upon every proper occasion, we should try to assist our State Department in making this purchase.

Mr. PAGE. And the Senator believes that it is possible to make the purchase within the next few years?

Mr. ASHURST. I think it is entirely possible to make this purchase within the next 10 years.

Now, Mr. President, before I go to another subject——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona a question. Has the Senator any estimate as to what it would cost the United States Government to purchase this peninsula?

Mr. ASHURST. I have no such estimate. I have had conversations with eminent people who are supposed to understand the matter and to speak for some Mexican authorities, but I am unable to answer the Senator.

Let me say this: The Gadsden Purchase, which embraced the southern part of Arizona and a little part of New Mexico, was concluded in 1853, and it was proposed to pay $15,000,000 for that purchase. The Senate, however, rejected the treaty, because they said the sum was too large. However, a reconsideration was had, and a treaty was adopted paying Mexico $10,000,000 for that purchase. I have no idea that the land in question in this case could be acquired for any such small sum.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the Senator's idea is that negotiation could reduce the price to a reasonable sum?

Mr. ASHURST. I think negotiations could reduce the price to a reasonable sum, but we need not hope to acquire this tract of land for such a comparatively small sum as was paid for the Gadsden Purchase. Now, before I leave that particular subject, I desire to discuss one other question.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator from Arizona leaves that subject, referring to the question of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], in reference to the pride of Mexico, I desire to say that it seems to me, however delicate the pride of the Mexicans might be, or whatever might be their sensitiveness, this transaction could be carried on in perfect harmony with their pride and national spirit. It has been only a few months since we have acquired from Denmark the Virgin Islands.

Mr. ASHURST. I was going to refer to that, but I am glad the Senator from Oklahoma has done so.

Mr. GORE. Denmark is a very proud and sensitive nation and commands the respect of the world. It is not long since Russia, at that time one of the most powerful nations on the globe, sold Alaska to the United States. Spain at one time obtained Louisiana from France, but subsequently ceded it back to France, and France ceded it to the United States. Great Britain for 20 years—from 1762 to 1783—owned the Floridas, but she subsequently ceded them back to Spain. Such cession is not an unusual transaction, and is perfectly compatible with national pride.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, on this large map [indicating]—I doubt if Senators can see it—I have marked on the little strip of Sonora, in the northwestern part of the State of Sonora, the words "potash, sodium, sulphates." There is a rainless portion of our western world. On the Pacific side of the peninsula there are numerous small islands bearing sea-bird guano and carrying an important percentage of potassium nitrate.

Where did I get that information? I have never been there, though I have been here [indicating Sonora on the map], but I have never been upon the peninsula. I repeat, where did I get that information? From Germany; from German reservists. The United States Government did not know it; but the German reservists, spying out of this country, looking for a place of refuge, discovered the guano, the potash, and sodium, and the information was sent to Germany. A citizen of Arizona, whose name I am not at liberty to mention, obtained the information—which our State Department did not have—that this land was rich in the same kind of nitrates that are found in Chile, and that these numerous islands were covered, and have been covered in the centuries gone by, with great deposits of bird guano, carrying an important percentage of nitrate of potassium. This unknown land has been a refuge, a hiding place for our enemies; and Mexico, even had she been willing to do so, would have been unable to resist the agression of our enemies in the late war. That is all the more reason why American statesmanship, care, and provision for the future should be turned to the acquisition of that tract of land, which, I repeat for nearly the twentieth time, is and always will be of no real substantial value to civilization while it is controlled by Mexico.

I was just about to reach a point regarding the purchase of the Virgin Islands when my friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] interrupted me. It has been said that the agitation of this question—indeed, I read it in a newspaper yesterday—was untimely while peace negotiations were going on. Untimely! It is the very model of prudence, magnanimity, and fair dealing. It sets an example to the other nations of the world. When Germany, with her mailed fist and spiked helmet, was overrunning Belgium, destroying Poland, and starving Serbia, the United States Government, the most opulent, the most puissant nation the world ever saw, was honorably buying the Virgin Islands from a small but a noble power. The United States Government, while the war was on, placed herself into juxtaposition with Germany—Germany, with her spiked helmet and poison gas, taking, and the United States Government honorably buying what she wished, thereby setting a noble example to the other nations of the earth.

What better news could be sent to the peace conference at Versailles than that the United States is contemplating the honorable purchase—not the forcible seizure—of some land which it needs and which its neighbor does not need?

Now, as to this so-called sentiment that nations never wish to change their frontier line, let me say that all national frontiers are subject to constant fluctuations and will forever be shrinking and expanding. National frontiers can no more remain delimited and static than can the coast lines of oceans, for they are those indefinable shores where break and beat the restless and turbulent seas of life.

The frontiers of any country are the boundaries that separate it from its neighbors. Sometimes the frontier lines are great natural topographical features, such as mountain chains or rivers; sometimes they are arbitrary lines shifted from time to time by the caprice of rulers or the aggressions of the more powerful; but the frontier lines of our Nation in continental United States have never been shifted at the caprice of any ruler. Justice, fair play, and honest purchases alone have characterized our acquisitions of territory. Our frontier line, like the receding shadow line of the sundial which marks the hourly passage of time, has receded toward the west under the influence of the advancing sun of civilization until after a long journey it has reached the shores of the great Pacific. The recession of our frontier is the most important and most interesting fact of our national history, embracing a series of events as brilliant in statesmanship as they are unstained by wrong or injustice.

The first settlements were made on our eastern coast 300 years ago, and these 300 years of progressive development have a history as brilliant as it is varied in its coloring—like a gorgeous piece of tapestry, some of its threads are golden, some are silver, and some are crimson with the lifeblood of the pioneer freely shed in his contest with savage beasts and savage men; but they are interwoven into one picture of civil and religious freedom such as mankind has never in all the ages looked upon before. So this acquisition of Lower California by the United States and the obtaining of the control of the Colorado River by the United States must likewise, as I know it will, be accomplished without wrong or injustice toward our weaker neighbor, who is at this time debilitated, torn, and distracted.

Mexico needs gold; it needs that stimulus to its enterprises which gold alone can give. Gold will assist Mexico to rehabilitate herself. With ample credits she would be able to pay her floating obligations and interest on her bonded debts, bring about some semblance of law and order and give security to life and property. If we are really a friend of Mexico, as we have so stridently proclaimed, here is an opportunity to show our friendship with something more substantial than words. Let us show our friendship by concluding a fair bargain in accepting from Mexico this vast tract of land which she does not need, can not police, and which, if she retains, would be for the next hundred years the same desert waste it has been during all the past.

The public man who omits to grasp an opportunity which may in the future be of benefit or safety to those who live under our stainless flag is recreant to his trust.

Our duty is plain. In these troublous times we in charge of the Nation's destiny, holding the most sacred deposit ever confided to human hands, should not shirk nor shrink. If we perform these duties, glory will be our portion; if we fail, it will be to our shame. There is no remorse so deep, so poignant, so inveterate, as that which comes from the consciousness that we have failed at a supreme crisis to avail ourselves of an opportunity to perform a real and needful public service to our country, and there is no happiness more sustaining, more enduring, or more unselfish than the consciousness that we have met in a worthy manner the responsibilities upon us.

Fortune, success, and opportunity soar aloft on high and rapid wing. They must be seized as they pass by. It is a difficult task to overtake them once they have left us behind or found us asleep or afraid.

All success, whether of a nation, a political party, a business firm, or an individual, comes only from exacting toil and diligent labor, coupled with the ability to recognize an opportunity, however vagrant and disguised it may present itself. The individual, the party, the State that succeeds is the posthaster, not the postponer. Pass this resolution and the Senate will have the sympathy and support of all honest, reasonable, and patriotic people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition does the Senator from Arizona desire made of his resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I wish to address myself for not over 10 minutes to the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. At the conclusion of the remarks of my colleague, if no Senator desires to address himself to the resolution, I shall ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the question that has entertained the Senate this afternoon is one as old as our War with Mexico. Time and again in my career since I have been in public life I have made, and I have attempted to cause others to make, efforts in the line of the resolution now introduced and ably advocated by my colleague. In order to arrive at any sort of contractual relations with Mexico, in view of the extreme pride of that extremely proud people, a pride that survives even amidst the most abject poverty that can be imposed upon it, we must approach the question not with denunciation, but in this body and everywhere else by making excuses, without calling to the attention of the world the frailties of our neighbor. We know we have the power to do what we please with her; but let us see if we can not get this resolution reported and passed through the Senate, and in every step of these proceedings draw closer and closer to those who must ultimately govern that Republic for good or for evil. By that means, and by that means alone, can we hope to accomplish anything under the resolution; and I rose more for the purpose of cautioning the Senate in our deliberations concerning nations to preserve that urbanity which is supposed to exist among gentlemen.

Senators, Mexico is indebted to the United States in enormous sums of money. There is a resolution now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will probably be acted upon tomorrow, pressing Mexico for an adjustment of what, in round numbers, I should guess to be something like $300,000,000 on account of damages sustained by American citizens. France and England have likewise great claims against Mexico, for which we are in a sense sponsor or guardian, in that we would not permit any aggression by any foreign power on the shores of Mexico for the purpose of seizing territory in any event for the settlement of debts. The consideration of these matters is going to cause trouble in connection with this resolution. The only way, as I have stated, by which we can ever hope to make one step forward is to commence this day in all public speeches, in all our addresses on the subject of our relations with Mexico, to pity the condition into which the ignorance of many of her people has caused her to be thrown.

Think of the German propaganda that from a time preceding this war up to this very minute has been poisoning the minds of the poor Mexicans against our Nation, and not altogether without some basis in fact. We have not treated Mexico right on the frontier, although we have done the best we could. I am not complaining of that; but I am offering it as a reason why we should act with temperance in our dealings with the Mexican people and place ourselves, if we can, in their shoes.

Think of how the Mexicans have been raised; think of the conditions under which they have attempted their self-development. The Englishman and the Frenchman were not altogether averse 10 years ago, when I was much more familiar with Mexico than I am to-day, to keeping Mexico scared to death as to the time when the great northern cloud should oversweep even her mountain tops and the strength of America find its expression in the grabbing of the Republic of Mexico. That was done for commercial and trade purposes, but it has left its impress on the heart and soul of those who would love to be friends of ours. Yet we have done nothing on earth to set aside the impression made by such propaganda. We have not had the opportunity to do so, it is true, in the last three or four years, for we have been too busy; but I do adjure Congress to take this resolution, deal with it in sympathy, and in pity where it is needed, because it has to do with a proud people, a people as brave as we are, and who hold their honor as sacred as we possibly can hold ours. Let us deal with them on the terms of perfect equality, which should exist between two contracting parties. This being carried out, I have great hope that within the next four or five or six years we may find no trouble in the world in securing that peninsula, which is absolutely invaluable to us; make that great gulf an American sea, if you please; open the Colorado River absolutely to American control, fructifying the lands that lie on the northern coast of Sonora and on the peninsula of Lower California, which will never be done, as has been so forcefully and so often said by my colleague, in the next hundred years if left under present conditions.

I have nothing more to say, Mr. President, at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Arizona.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it is very essential that the bill authorizing the next census be passed by the Senate at the earliest possible opportunity, and in order that it may become the unfinished business, I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses. The fourteenth decennial census will be taken early next year. It will be an enormous task, necessitating painstaking and comprehensive preparation. I therefore make the motion in order that the bill may be before the Senate at its next meeting.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, which had been reported from the Committee on the Census with amendments.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In order that the Senate may have the bill before it when we next meet, I ask that the bill as reported to the Senate be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill referred to is as follows:

An act (H. R. 11984) to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Be it enacted, etc., That a census of the population, agriculture, manufactures, forestry and forest products, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1920 and every 10 years thereafter. The census herein provided for shall include each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. A census of Guam and Samoa shall be taken in the same year by the respective governors of said islands and a census of the Panama Canal Zone by the governor of the Canal Zone in accordance with plans prescribed or approved by the Director of the Census.

SEC. 2. That the period of three years beginning the 1st day of July next preceding the census provided for in section 1 of this act shall be known as the decennial census period, and the reports upon the inquiries provided for in said section shall be completed and published within such period.

SEC. 3. That during the decennial census period, and no longer, there may be employed in the Census Office, in addition to the force provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, an assistant director, who shall be an experienced practical statistician; a chief statistician, who shall be a person of known and tried experience in statistical work; a disbursing clerk; an appointment clerk; a private secretary to the director; 4 stenographers; 8 expert chiefs of division; and 15 statistical experts. The assistant director shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The chief statistician, the disbursing clerk, the appointment clerk, the chiefs of divisions, and the private secretary to the director shall be appointed without examination by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census. The statistical experts and the stenographers shall be appointed in conformity with the civil-service act and rules: Provided, That no man appointed or employed or who shall hereafter be appointed or employed under this act shall on account of such employment be certified by any official or authority for deferred classification under act No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, or under any act amendatory thereof that has been or shall hereafter be enacted: Provided further, That whenever practicable women and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors shall be employed in the positions herein provided for.

SEC. 4. That the assistant director shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Director of the Census. In the absence of the director, the assistant director shall serve as director, and in the absence of the director and the assistant director, the chief clerk shall serve as director.

The appointment clerk shall perform the duties assigned him by the Director of the Census. The disbursing clerk of the Census Office shall, at the beginning of the decennial census period, give bond to the Secretary of the Treasury in the sum of $100,000, surety to be approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury, which bond shall be conditioned that the said officer shall render, quarter yearly, a true and faithful account to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of all moneys and properties which shal be received by him by virtue of his office during the said decennial census period. Such bond shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

SEC. 5. That during the decennial census period the annual compensation of the officials of the Census Office shall be as follows: The Director of the Census, [$7,000] $7,500; the assistant director, [$4,500; three chief statisticans and the chief clerk, $3,000 each; two] $5,000; the chief clerk and three chief statisticans, $4,000 each; three other chief statisticans [$3,000] and the geographer, [$2,750] $3,000 each; the disbursing clerk, $3,000; the appointment clerk, $2,750; the chiefs of division, $2,250 each; the private secretary to the director, $2,250; the statistical experts, $2,000 each; and the stenographers provided for in section three of this act, $1,800 each.

SEC. 6. That in addition to the force hereinbefore provided for and to that authorized by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, there may be employed in the Census Office during the decennial census period, and no longer, as many clerks [of classes four, three, two, and one;] with salaries at the rates of $1,800, $1,680, $1,560, $1,440, $1,380, $1,320, $1,260, $1,200, $1,140, $1,080, $1,020, $960 and $900; one engineer at $1,200; and two photostat operators, at $1,200 each; as many skilled laborers, with salaries at the rate of not less than $720 nor more than $1,000 per annum; and as many messengers, assistant messengers, messenger boys, watchmen, unskilled laborers, and charwomen as may be found necessary for the proper and prompt performance of the duties herein required; these additional clerks and employees to be appointed by the Director of the Census: Provided, That the total number of such additional clerks [of classes two, three, and four] with salaries at the rate of $1,440 or more per annum shall at no time exceed one hundred and fifty: Provided further, That employees engaged in the compilation or tabulation of statistics by the use of mechanical devices may be compensated on a piece-price basis to be fixed by the director: Provided, That whenever possible women and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors shall be employed in the positions herein provided for.

SEC. 7. That the additional clerks and other employees provided for by section six shall be subject to such special test examinations as the Director of the Census may prescribe, [the said] subject to the approval of the United States Civil Service Commission, these examinations to be conducted by the United States Civil Service Commission, to be open to all applicants without regard to political party affiliations, and to be held at such places in each State as may be designated by the Civil Service Commission. Certifications shall be made by the Civil Service Commission upon request of the Director of the Census from the eligible registers so established, in conformity with the law of apportionment as now provided for the classified service, and selections therefrom shall be made by the Director of the Census, in the order of rating: Provided, That the requirement as to conformity with the law of apportionment shall not apply to messenger boys unskilled laborers, and charwomen: Provided further, That hereafter all examinations of applicants for positions in the [Census Office] Government service, from any State or Territory, shall be had in the State or Territory in which such applicant resides, and no person shall be eligible for such examination or appointment unless he or she shall have been actually domiciled in such State or Territory for at least one year previous to such examination: Provided further, That the Civil Service Commission [may] shall hold examination [for positions in such service] of applicants temporarily absent from the [place] places of their legal residence or domicile in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in the United States where examinations are usually held upon proof satisfactory to the commission that such [applicant is a] applicants are bona fide [resident] residents of the [State or Territory] State or Territories in which such [applicant claims to have a] applicants claim to have legal residence or domicile: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to abridge the existing law [or] of apportionment or change the requirements of existing law as to legal residence or domicile of such applicants: And provided further, That no person afflicted with tuberculosis shall be appointed and that each applicant for appointment shall accompany his or her aplication with a certificate of health from some reputable physician [: And provided further, That in no instance shall more than one person be appointed from the same family]: And provided further, That when the exigencies of the service require, the director may appoint for temporary employment not exceeding six months' duration from the aforesaid list of eligibles those who, by reason of residence or other conditions, are immediately available; and may also appoint for not exceeding six months' duration persons having had previous experience in operating mechanical appliances in census work whose efficiency records in operating such appliances are satisfactory to him, and may accept such records in lieu of the civil-service examination: And provided further, That employees in other branches of the departmental classified service who have had previous experience in census work may be transferred without exmaination to the Census Office to serve during the whole or a part of the decennial census period, and at the end of such service the employees so transferred shall be eligible to appointment to positions in any department held by them at date of transfer to the Census Office without examination; but no employee so transferred shall within one year after such transfer receive higher salary than he is receiving at the time of the transfer: And provided further, That during the decennial census period and no longer the Director of the Census may fill vacancies in the permanent force of the Census Office by the promotion or transfer of clerks or other employees employed on the temporary force authorized by section six of this act: And provided further, That at the expiration of the decennial census period the term of service of all employees so transferred and of all other temporary officers and employees appointed under the provisions of this act shall terminate, and such officers and employees shall not be eligible to appointment or transfer into the classified service of the Government by virtue of their examination or appointment under this act.

SEC. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries. The schedules relating to population shall include for each inhabitant the name, place of abode, relationship to head of family, color, sex, age, conjugal condition, place of birth, place of birth of parents, nationality or mother tongue of all persons born in foreign countries, nationality or mother tongue of parents of foreign birth, number of years in the United States, citizenship, occupation, whether or not employer or employee, whether or not engaged in agriculture, school attendance, literacy, and tenure of home, whether or not a survivor of any war in which the United States has been engaged, and, if so, of what war, and the name and address of each blind or deaf and dumb person.

The schedules relating to agriculture shall include name, color, sex, and country of birth of occupant of each farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, value of farm and improvements, and the encumbrance thereon, value of farm implements, number of live stock on farms, ranges, and elsewhere, and the acreage of crops and the quantities of crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration. Inquiries shall be made as to the quantity of land reclaimed by irrigation and drainage and the crops produced; also as to the location and character of irrigation and drainage enterprises, and the capital invested in such enterprises.

The schedules of inquiries relating to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries shall include the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, corporate, or other form; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital actually invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners and officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees and the amount of their wages; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; principal miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time in operation during the year; character and quantity of power used; and character and number of machines employed.

The census of manufactures, of forestry and forest products, and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration of population, and shall be confined to manufacturing establishments and mines and quarries which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

Whenever he shall deem it expedient, the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees, to be employed without respect to locality.

[The form and subdivision of inquiries necessary to obtain the information under the foregoing topics shall be] The number, form, and subdivision of inquiries provided for in section 8 shall be determined by the Director of the Census.

SEC. 9. That the Director of the Census shall, at least six months prior to the date fixed for commencing the enumeration at the Fourteenth and each succeeding decennial census, designate the number, whether one or more, of supervisors of census for each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, and shall define the districts within which they are to act; except that the Director of the Census, in his discretion, need not designate supervisors for Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, but in lieu thereof may employ special agents as hereinafter provided. The supervisors shall be appointed by the [Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census] President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That the whole number of supervisors shall not exceed 400: Provided further, That so far as practicable and desirable the boundaries of the supervisors' districts shall conform to the boundaries of the congressional districts: And provided further, That if in any supervisor's district the supervisor has not been appointed and qualified 90 days preceding the date fixed for the commencement of the enumeration, or if any vacancy shall occur thereafter, either through death, removal, or resignation of a supervisor, or from any other cause, the Director of the Census may appoint a temporary supervisor or detail an employee of the Census Office to act as supervisor for that district.

SEC. 10. That each supervisor of census shall be charged with the performance within his own district of the following duties: To consult with the Director of Census in regard to the division of his district into subdivisions most convenient for the purpose of the enumeration, which subdivisions or enumeration districts shall be defined and the boundaries thereof fixed by the Director of the Census; to designate to the director suitable persons and with his consent to employ such persons as enumerators, one or more for each subdivision; to communicate to enumerators the necessary instructions and directions relating to their duties; to examine and scrutinize the returns of the enumerators, and in the event of discrepancies or deficiencies appearing in any of the said returns, to use all diligence in causing the same to be corrected or supplied; to forward the completed returns of the enumerators to the director at such time and in such manner as shall be prescribed, and to make up and forward to the director the accounts of each enumerator in his district for service rendered, which accounts shall be duly certified to by the enumerator, and the same shall be certified as true and correct if so found by the supervisor, and said accounts so certified shall be accepted and paid by the director. The duties imposed upon the supervisor by this act shall be performed in any and all particulars in accordance with the orders and instructions of the Director of the Census.

SEC. 11. That each supervisor of the census shall, upon the completion of his duties to the satisfaction of the Director of the Census, receive the sum of $1,500, and in addition thereto $1 for each thousand or major fraction of a thousand of population enumerated in his district, such sums to be in full compensation for all services rendered and expenses incurred by him: Provided, That of the above-named compensation a sum not to exceed $600, in the discretion of the Director of the Census, may be paid to any supervisor prior to the completion of his duties in one or more payments, as the Director of the Census may determine: Provided further, That in emergencies arising in connection with the work of preparation for or during the progress of the enumeration in his district, or in connection with the reenumeration of any subdivision, a supervisor may, in the discretion of the Director of the Census, be allowed actual and necessary traveling expenses and an allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 per day during his necessary absence from his usual place of residence: And provided further, That an appropriate allowance to supervisors for clerk hire may be made when deemed necessary by the Director of the Census.

SEC. 12. That each enumerator shall be charged with the collection in his subdivision of the facts and statistics required by the population and agricultural schedules and such other schedules as the Director of the Census may determine shall be used by him in connection with the census, as provided in section eight of this act. It shall be the duty of each enumerator to visit personally each dwelling house in his subdivision, and each family therein, and each individual living out of a family in any place of abode, and by inquiry made of the head of each family, or of the member thereof deemed most competent and trustworthy, or of such individual living out of a family, to obtain each and every item of information and all particulars required by this act, as of date January first of the year in which the enumeration shall be made; and in case no person shall be found at the usual place of abode of such family, or individual living out of a family, competent to answer the inquiries made in compliance with the requirements of this act, then it shall be lawful for the enumerator to obtain the required information as nearly as may be practicable from the family or families or person or persons living nearest to such place of abode who may be competent to answer such inquires. It shall be the duty also of each enumerator to forward the original schedules, properly filled out and duly certified, to the supervisor of his district as his returns under the provision of this act; and in the event of discrepancies or deficiencies being discovered in these schedules he shall use all diligence in correcting or supplying the same. In case an enumeration district embraces all or any part of any incorporated borough, village, town, or city, and also other territory not included within the limits of such incorporated borough, village, town, or city, it shall be the duty of the enumerator to clearly and plainly distinguish and separate, upon the population schedules, the inhabitants of such borough, village, town, or city from the inhabitants of the territory not included therein. No enumerator shall be deemed qualified to enter upon his duties until he has received from the supervisor of the district to which he belongs a commission, signed by the supervisor, authorizing him to perform the duties of enumerator, and setting forth the boundaries of the subdivision within which such duties are to be performed.

SEC. 13. That the territory assigned to each supervisor shall be divided into as many enumeration districts as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and, in the discretion of the Director of the Census, two or more enumeration districts may be given to one enumerator, and the boundaries of all the enumeration districts shall be clearly described by civil divisions, rivers, roads, public surveys, or other easily distinguishable lines: Provided, That enumerators may be assigned for the special enumeration of institutions when desirable, without reference to the number of inmates.

SEC. 14. That any supervisor of census may, with the approval of the Director of the Census, remove any enumerator in his district and fill the vacancy thus caused or otherwise occurring. Whenever it shall appear that any portion of the census provided for in this act has been negligently or improperly taken, and is by reason thereof incomplete or erroneous, the Director of the Census may cause such incomplete and unsatisfactory enumeration and census to be amended or made anew.

SEC. 15. That the Director of the Census may authorize and direct supervisors of census to employ interpreters to assist the enumerators of their respective districts in the enumeration of persons not speaking the English language, but no authorization shall be given for such employment in any district until due and proper effort has been made to employ an enumerator who can speak the language or languages for which the services of an interpreter would otherwise be required. It shall be the duty of such interpreters to accompany the enumerator and faithfully translate the latter's inquiries and the replies thereto, but in no case shall any such interpreter perform the duties of enumerator unless commissioned as such by the Director of the Census. The compensation of such interpreters shall be fixed by the Director of the Census in advance, and shall not exceed $5 per day for each day actually and necessarily employed.

SEC. 16. That the compensation of enumerators shall be determined by the Director of the Census as follows: In subdivisions where he shall deem such remuneration sufficient, an allowance of not less than 2 nor more than 4 cents for each inhabitant; not less than 20 nor more than 30 cents for each establishment of productive industry reported; not less than 20 nor more than 30 cents for each farm reported; not less than 20 nor more than 50 cents for each irrigation or drainage enterprise reported; and 10 cents for each barn and inclosure containing live stock not on farms. In other subdivisions the Director of the Census may fix a mixed rate of not less than $1 nor more than $2 per day and, in addition, an allowance of not less than 1 nor more than 3 cents for each inhabitant enumerated, and not less than 15 nor more than 20 cents for each farm and each establishment or productive industry reported. In other subdivisions per diem rates shall be fixed by the director according to the difficulty of enumeration, having special reference to the regions to be canvassed and the sparsity of settlement or other consideration pertinent thereto. The compensation allowed to an enumerator in any such district shall not be less than $3 nor more than $6 per day of eight hours' actual field work, and no payment shall be made for time in excess of eight hours for any one day. The subdivisions or enumeration districts to which the several rates of compensation shall apply shall be designated by the Director of the Census at least two weeks in advance of the enumeration. No claim for mileage or traveling expenses shall be allowed any enumerator in either class of subdivisions, except in extreme cases, and then only when authority has been previously granted by the Director of the Census; and the decision of the director as to the amount due any enumerator shall be final: Provided, That within the limits of continental United States each supervisor to be appointed or selected under this act shall be an actual resident of the district, and each enumerator to be appointed or selected under this [act,] act shall, so far as practicable, be an actual resident of the subdivision within which his duties are to be performed; but an enumerator may be appointed if he be an actual resident of the city, township, or other civil division of which the subdivision in which his duties are to be performed is a part.

SEC. 17. That in the event of the death of any supervisor or enumerator after his appointment and entrance on his duties, the Director of the Census is authorized to pay to the widow or legal representative of such supervisor or enumerator such sum as he may deem just and fair for the services rendered by such supervisor or enumerator.

SEC. 18. That special agents may be appointed by the Director of the Census to carry out the provisions of this act and of the act to provide for a permanent Census Office, approved March 6, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto; and such special agents shall perform such duties in connection with the enforcement of said acts as may be required of them by the Director of the Census. The special agents thus appointed shall receive compensation at rates to be fixed by the Director of the Census, such compensation, however, not to exceed $6 per diem except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That during the decennial census period the Director of the Census may fix the compensation of not to exceed 25 special agents, who shall be persons of known and tried experience in statistical work, at an amount not to exceed $10 per diem: Provided further, That the Director of the Census may, in his discretion, fix the compensation of special agents on a piece-price basis without limitation as to the amount earned per diem: And provided further, That the special agents appointed under this section shall be entitled to necessary traveling expenses and an allowance in lieu of subsistence not to exceed $4 per diem during necessary absence from their usual places of residence; but no pay or allowance in lieu of subsistence shall be allowed special agents when employed in the Census Office on other than the special work committed to them, and no appointments of special agents shall be made for clerical work: And provided further, That the Director of the Census shall have power, and is hereby authorized, to appoint special agents to assist the supervisors whenever he may deem it proper, in connection with the work of preparation for, or during the progress of, the enumeration or in connection with the reenumeration of any district or a part thereof; or he may, in his discretion, employ for this purpose any of the permanent or temporary employees of the Census Office; and the special agents and employees of the Census Office so appointed or employed shall perform such duties in connection with the enforcement of this act as may be required of them by the Director of the Census or by the supervisors of the districts to which they are assigned, and when engaged in the work of enumeration or reenumeration shall have like authority with and perform the same duties as the enumerators in respect to the subjects committed to them under this act.

SEC. 19. That every supervisor, supervisor's clerk, enumerator, interpreter, special agent, or other employee shall take and subscribe to an oath or affirmation, to be prescribed by the Director of the Census. All appointees and employees provided for in this act shall be appointed or employed and examined, if examination is required by this act, solely with reference to their fitness to perform the duties required of them by the provisions of this act and without reference to their political party affiliations.

SEC. 20. That the enumeration of the population required by section 1 of this act shall be taken as of the 1st day of January, and it shall be the duty of each enumerator to commence the enumeration of his district on the day following, unless the Director of the Census, in his discretion, shall defer the enumeration in said district by reason of climatic or other conditions which would materially interfere with the proper conduct of the work; but in any event it shall be the duty of each enumerator to prepare the returns hereinbefore required to be made and to forward the same to the supervisor of his district within 30 days from the commencement of the enumeration of his district: Provided, That in any city having [5,000] 2,500 inhabitants or more under the preceding census the enumeration of the population shall be completed within two weeks from the commencement thereof.

SEC. 21. That if any person shall receive or secure to himself any fee, reward, or compensation as a consideration for the appointment or employment of any person as supervisor, enumerator, or clerk, or other employee, or shall in any way receive or secure to himself any part of the compensation paid to any supervisor, enumerator, or clerk, or other employee, he shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $3,000 and be imprisoned not more than five years.

SEC. 22. That any supervisor, supervisor's clerk, enumerator, interpreter, special agent, or other employee who, having taken and subscribed the oath of office required by this act, shall, without justifiable cause, neglect or refuse to perform the duties enjoined on him by this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $500; or if he shall, without the authority of the Director of the Census, publish or communicate any information coming into his possession by reason of his employment under the provisions of this act, or the act to provide for a permanent Census Office or acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, he shall be guilty of a felony and shall upon conviction thereof be fined not to exceed $1,000 or be imprisoned not to exceed two years, or both so fined and imprisoned, in the discretion of the court; or if he shall willfully and knowingly swear or affirm falsely as to the truth of any statement required to be made or subscribed by him under oath by or under authority of this act or of the act to provide for a permanent Census Office or acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, he shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $2,000 or imprisoned not exceeding five years, or both; or if he shall willfully and knowingly make a false certificate or a fictitious return he shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction of either of the last-named offenses he shall be fined not exceeding $2,000 or be imprisoned not exceeding five years, or both; or if any person who is or has been an enumerator shall knowingly or willfully furnish or cause to be furnished, directly or indirectly, to the Director of the Census or to any supervisor of the census any false statement or false information with reference to any inquiry for which he was authorized and required to collect information he shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $2,000 or be imprisoned not exceeding five years, or both.

SEC. 23. That it shall be the duty of all persons over 18 years of age when requested by the Director of the Census, or by any supervisor, enumerator, or special agent, or other employee of the Census Office, acting under the instructions of the said director, to answer correctly, to the best of their knowledge, all questions on the census schedules applying to themselves and to the families to which they belong or are related, and to the farm or farms of which they or their families are the occupants; and any person over 18 years of age who, under the conditions hereinbefore stated, shall refuse or willfully neglect to answer any of these questions, or shall willfully give answers that are false, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $100.

And it is hereby made unlawful for any individual, committee, or other organization of any kind whatsoever to offer or render to any supervisor, supervisor's clerk, enumerator, interpreter, special agent, or other officer or employee of the Census Office engaged in making an enumeration of population, either directly or indirectly, any suggestion, advice, or assistance of any kind, with the intent or purpose of causing an inaccurate enumeration of population to be made, either as to the number of persons resident in any district or community, or in any other respect; and any individual, or any officer or member of any committee or other organization of any kind whatsoever, who directly or indirectly offers or renders any such suggestion, advice, information, or assistance, with such unlawful intent or purpose, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

And it shall be the duty of every owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, or agent of a hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building, when requested by the Director of the Census, or by any supervisor, enumerator, special agent, or other employee of the census office, acting under the instructions of the said director to furnish the names of the occupants of said hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building, and to give thereto free ingress and egress to any duly accredited representative of the census office, so as to permit of the collection of statistics for census purposes, including the proper and correct enumeration of all persons having their usual place of abode in said hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building; and any owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, or agent of a hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building who shall refuse or willfully neglect to give such information or assistance under the conditions hereinbefore stated shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $500.

SEC. 24. That it shall be the duty of every owner, official, agent, person in charge, or assistant to the person in charge, of any company, business, institution, establishment, religious body, or organization of any nature whatsoever, to answer completely and correctly to the best of his knowledge all questions relating to his respective company, business, institution, establishment, religious body, or other organization, or to records or statistics in his official custody, contained on any census schedule prepared by the Director of the Census under the authority of this act, or of the act to provide for a permanent census office, approved March 6, 1902, or of acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto; and any person violating the provisions of this section by refusing or willfully neglecting to answer any of said questions, or by willfully giving answers that are false, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $10,000, or imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both so fined and imprisoned.

The provisions of this section shall also apply to the collection of the information required and authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent census office," and by acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

SEC. 25. That the information furnished under the provisions of the next preceding section shall be used only for the statistical purposes for which it is supplied. No publication shall be made by the census office whereby the data furnished by any particular establishment can be identified, nor shall the Director of the Census permit anyone other than the sworn employees of the census office to examine the individual reports.

SEC. 26. That all fines and penalties imposed by this act may be enforced by indictment or information in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 27. That the Director of the Census may authorize the expenditure of necessary sums for the actual and necessary traveling expenses of the officers and employees of the census office, including an allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 per day during their necessary absence from the census office, or, instead of such an allowance, their actual subsistence expenses, not to exceed $5 per day; and he may authorize the incidental, miscellaneous, and contingent expenses necessary for the carrying out of this act, as herein provided, and not otherwise, including advertising in newspapers, the purchase of manuscripts, books of reference, and periodicals, the rental of sufficient quarters in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and the furnishing thereof, and expenditures necessary for compiling, printing, publishing, and distributing the results of the census, the purchase of necessary paper and other supplies, the purchase, rental, exchange, construction, and repair of mechanical appliances, the compensation of such permanent and temporary clerks as may be employed under the provisions of this act and the act establishing the permanent census office and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and all other expenses incurred under authority conveyed in this act.

SEC. 28. That the Director of the Census is hereby authorized to make requisition upon the Public Printer for such printing as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, to wit: Blanks, schedules, circulars, pamphlets, envelopes, work sheets, and other items of miscellaneous printing; that he is further authorized to have printed by the Public Printer, in such editions as the director may deem necessary, preliminary and other census bulletins, and final reports of the results of the several investigations authorized by this act or by the act to establish a permanent Census Office and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and to publish and distribute said bulletins and reports.

SEC. 29. That all mail matter, of whatever class or weight, relating to the census and addressed to the Census Office, or to any official thereof, and indorsed "Official business, Census Office," shall be transmitted free of postage, and by registered mail if necessary, and so marked: Provided, That if any person shall make use of such indorsement to avoid the payment of postage or registry fee on his or her private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 30. That the Secretary of Commerce, whenever he may deem it advisable, on request of the Director of the Census, is hereby authorized to call upon any other department or office of the Government for information pertinent to the work herein provided for.

SEC. 31. That there shall be in the year 1925, and once every 10 years thereafter, a census of agriculture and live stock, which shall show the acreage of farm land, the acreage of the principal crops, and the number and value of the domestic animals on the farms and ranges of the country. The schedule employed in this census shall be prepared by the Director of the Census. Such census shall be taken as of the 1st day of January and shall relate to the preceding calendar year. The Director of the Census may appoint enumerators or special agents for the purpose of this census in accordance with the provisions of the permanent census act.

SEC. 32. That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect and publish, for the years 1921, 1923, 1925, and 1927, and for every tenth year after each of said years, statistics of the products of manufacturing industries; and the director is hereby authorized to prepare such schedules as in his judgment may be necessary.

SEC. 33. That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, upon the written request of the governor of any State or Territory or of a court of record, to furnish such governor or court of record with certified copies of so much of the population or agricultural returns as may be requested, upon the payment of the actual cost of making such copies and $1 additional for certification; and that the Director of the Census is further authorized, in his discretion, to furnish to individuals such data from the population schedules as may be desired for genealogical or other proper purposes, upon payment of the actual cost of searching the records and $1 for supplying a certificate; and that the Director of the Census is authorized to furnish transcripts of tables and other records and to prepare special statistical compilations for State or local officials, private concerns, or individuals upon the payment of the actual cost of such work: Provided, however, That in no case shall information furnished under the authority of this act be used to the detriment of the person or persons to whom such information relates. All moneys hereafter received by the Bureau of the Census in payment for labor and materials used in furnishing transcripts of census records or special statistical compilations from such records shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation for collecting statistics.

SEC. 34. That the act establishing the permanent Census Office, approved March 6, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, except as are herein amended, shall remain in full force. That the act entitled "An act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses," approved July 2, 1909, and acts amendatory thereof, and all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the armed forces of the United States landed in Russia some months ago under the orders of the Commander in Chief are—if the press dispatches can be relief upon at all—engaged at the present time in making war upon Russia.

Some of the troops employed in the military operations there are from my own State, and I ask to be officially informed as to the presence of our troops in Russia, and I think the Congress and the country ought to know why we are making war upon the Russian people.

On the 2d of this month there appeared in the New York Times a dispatch stating that soldiers from Wisconsin and from an adjoining State were at the time engaged in desperate military operations in Russia and against Russian troops. The item, which is in the form of a "delayed dispatch," I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read down to the point I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 2, 1919.]

ALLIES IN RUSSIA DRIVE BACK REDS—AMERICANS TAKE BRILLIANT PART IN ATTACK ON FRONT SOUTH OF ARCHANGEL—IN CAMOUFLAGE FLANK FOE—WINTER QUARTERS WON BY ADVANCE—ALLIES GAIN ON THE ONEGA AND DVINA.

AMERICAN HEADQUARTERS IN NORTHERN RUSSIA,
December 30. (Delayed.)

Fighting their way through the untracked forest and deep snow, American soldiers of the 339th Regiment, with the Polish Legion, Russian volunteers, and their French allies, have advanced 15 miles up the Onega River on the extreme west of the Archangel sector, driving the Bolsheviki before them. A score of tiny native log-hut villages have fallen, and to-night, with a snowstorm raging, the men are held up by overwhelming numbers of Bolsheviki.

Some 75 miles east of this Onega fighting the American troops, supported by Canadian artillery, have captured the town of Kadish, and established lines one-half mile south.

These two victories comprise a tremendous improvement of the allied outpost positions, which, stretching like ribs, run over a 400-mile front, with Archangel as a hub.

It is impossible to conceive of a stranger, more picturesque, or more romantic bit of action than these two advances. No sun shines these winter days, and it is only light for four or five hours at the most. On all sides stretch the endless, dreary, depressing forests of fir, cut only by a few trails and frozen rivers. Little native villages dot these river banks, and in the log huts the simple, peaceful peasants hibernate during the long winter months.

To-night on this Onega River, 40 miles west of the Vologda-Archangel Railroad, 20 of these villages are in the hands of the allies. With this gain and prize there will probably be no more advances attempted for some time.

The heavy, gray Russian dawn had just broken at 9 o'clock when the artillery began the preliminary bombardment against the Bolsheviki position. Only with the greatest difficulty had the guns been dragged across the snows, but it had been done, and this morning the French artillery opened what may be the last advance in which American troops will ever take part.

After a few minutes of heavy shelling the allies left the blockhouses and advanced up the river roads straight at the enemy positions. Already flanking parties, drawing hand sleds loaded with ammunition and rations, had made their way through the forest and were attacking the rear. Every man was clothed in a heavy Arctic outfit and wore a white canvas robe with a cowl that in the faint light even of midday made him indistinguishable at a few hundred yards.

At 4 o'clock in the morning these gallant flanking parties had cut into the woods on the great adventure. In snow knee deep, with the temperature at zero, they were starting for unknown parts, across uncharted woods, on a desperate charge. It was really romantic.

Stunned by the surprise attack from the front, the Bolsheviki fell back from their advance positions. Immediately their rear was endangered by the flanking parties, so they were forced to withdraw several miles. Here in a log-hut village they made a determined stand, utilizing the strongly built native houses with small windows and heavy doors as blockhouses. There was heavy fighting here, and again and again the Americans and their allies charged these improvised blockhouses. Steadily the Bolsheviki were forced back, fighting desperately in each little village as they took up retreating positions.

Finally late in the afternoon, when the twilight had settled down, they stiffened their defense, and 15 miles from the old positions they stopped the sweeping advance of the allies. The Bolsheviki suffered considerable casualties and some prisoners. Our losses were comparatively small.

Seventy-five miles east, on the other side of the railroad, the American soldiers with Canadian artillery fought to-day another gallant battle. Some 10 weeks ago the allies had been forced back by superior numbers from the little village of Kadish, and had taken up a position on the Emtsa River, 2 miles to the north. Here in the forest they built tiny blockhouses, lean-tos, and shelters, and camped in the ice and snow. To reach them there was a two-day sled trip from the railroad, and the only road from there on to the next allied position eastward was a tedious, dangerous, roundabout trail.

In Kadish village there were warm log houses, and running at right angles from the town was a straight road leading direct to the next allied outpost. To-night this village, with its comfortable billets and valuable road, is in the hands of the Americans, while our forward positions are a mile and a half beyond.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to comment at length upon the disclosures made in that dispatch. It is said further:

Five hundred Wisconsin and Michigan men, struggling gamely through the heavy snow, carrying rifles, ammunition, machine guns, and extra rations, did the job of flanking the Bolsheviki and surprising them much the same as their British pals did the trick 75 miles to the west.

I do not know how other Senators may feel, but I should be false to my conception of duty to my State and to her people if I did not exhaust every means in my power to find out by what right hundreds of young men of Wisconsin are engaged in conducting a war on Russia.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows what has become of the resolution proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to find out why our troops are in Russia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood that it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Not being a member of that committee, I do not know what consideration it is receiving at the hands of the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do. The Senator from Virginia is a member of the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] expected to have made a speech or a statement to-day in reference to the Russian situation. To-morrow the committee anticipated taking up that matter for consideration, and expected to hear the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Polk, regarding the Russian situation. On account of some Senators who are members of that committee attending the funeral of Col. Roosevelt, the meeting of the committee, as I understand, has been deferred. There is no disposition in the committee to shirk any information that it is proper to give nor to shirk giving the resolution consideration.

As the Senator from Wisconsin has asked why our soldiers are at Archangel, I think possibly I can give him the information.

As soon as the North Sea was mined, and also the English Channel, it was nearly impossible for German submarines to get out into the ocean. When there was a collapse in Russia—and it was quite a collapse—and the Russian forces had surrendered to the Germans, and the Government there was thought to be more or less in alliance with the German Government, the next place where Germany sought to have a submarine base was at Archangel. It was possibly the only place available for a submarine base, from which submarines could go out and prey upon the commerce of the allies and also their ships. There was quite a discussion as to what should be done to take care of Archangel and the large supplies the allies had there. The Germans were endeavoring to get through Finland, the existing Government of which was friendly; and there is an impression, which I think is justified, that the Bolshevik Government was friendly to Germany. If the Germans had been able to take Archangel, had been able to establish a submarine base there, and could have operated their submarines from there, it would have been a greater menace than was possible anywhere else for the use of the submarines as an efficient naval arm.

In order to prevent this, and to take care of the vast supplies that were already landed there that the Germans were trying to get, as I understand—not speaking authoritatively but from information that I have in a more or less general way—the allies reached a conclusion as to what they should do to prevent this menace; and I think the United States sent about 2,500 men to unite with the allies to hold Archangel. That was, first, to take care of the vast supplies there; second, to prevent the great menace of a submarine base there, which would have been very disastrous to the allies if Archangel had been captured and used for that purpose.

I think the allies have from fifteen to twenty thousand men there, with about twenty-five hundred United States troops. I am not speaking authoritatively, but simply from general information. There was no intention, as I understand, to go farther than to hold Archangel and the country surrounding there, so as to make it safe for the allies, and so that the German menace could not be continued by capturing that as a submarine base.

Archangel was thus held, and the surrounding country out far enough to make it safe. In occupying this place we acquired obligations to many citizens of Russia who united with and aided us. To leave immediately, and to give up Archangel until some terms of peace have been made, would be to let these Russian friends of ours be massacred, murdered. It would be cowardly desertion. In addition to that, we would lose the supplies.

That, as I understand, is the present situation at Archangel. I know, as the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, that there was great apprehension that Archangel would be captured and used as a base for submarines by Germany.

As to what is the ultimate purpose, when these troops should be withdrawn, I am not prepared to say. I am not prepared to say what the conditions are or to what extent the government in Russia might be in alliance with Germany, or what the future conditions might be. All I can say is that if war should arise in the future, if Archangel should be in the hands of anybody adverse to this country or the allies, it would be a very serious situation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have listened to the explanation made by the Senator from Virginia, who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and while it does "explain" the sending of the troops to Russia, it does not set forth what I think at the time was commonly understood to be the reason why they were sent in. Mr. President, with regard to the observation of the Senator, that it was supposed that the revolutionary—the soviet—government of Russia was friendly to, supporting, and in sympathy with Germany, I wish to say that the information which has come to me, and of the reliability of which I have no doubt, because I know personally some of the people who have been in and who brought the information out of Russia, is contrary to the view expressed by the Senator. I think, before anyone assumes to arrive at a conclusion upon that subject, all the information obtainable in this country should be carefully considered.

A mass of information came out of Russia last May. Some Senators had an opportunity to see and examine it, or at least to hear a statement with regard to it. At that time, Mr. President, it was my privilege to see original documents by which the reliability of that evidence was attested, not only by the representatives of our Government in Russia, but by the representatives in Russia of other Governments with whom we were cooperating. I think, sir, that the proof is overwhelming that the soviet government from the beginning exerted itself in every possible way to enlist the sympathy and support of the Government of the United States, to the end that it might be strong enough to resist the German Government.

Mr. President, I did not expect to go into that matter at all, or to touch upon this question in any way, excepting to present my inquiry.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Pardon me just one moment. Let me say this, further:

Whatever comes to the American people through the censored channels of the press regarding the soviet government of Russia ought to be subjected to pretty careful scrutiny before it is accepted as stating the whole truth. The great organized wealth of all the established governments of the world at this time fears above all things on earth the principles attempted to be established by the soviet government of Russia. So long as the news channels are censored it is not to be expected that there shall be permitted to reach the ears of the masses of the people of the world anything approaching the truth with respect to that government or what is taking place in Russia at this time.

I think the Senate was fortunate this afternoon in having presented to it the able address of the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] with reference to the purchase of Lower California. It was not my privilege to hear all of that address, but I inquired about one feature of it from another Senator, because I did not wish to interrupt unnecessarily touching any matter upon which the Senator had spoken. I understand that he started with the proposition that before negotiations should be opened whereby this Government should reach out and acquire Lower California the people who live there were to be consulted, and their wishes were to be controlling in the matter; that peoples are not to be bought and sold because governments have power; that little nations ought to have their rights respected; that any government in the world that suits the people of a country, whether it suits the people of neighboring nations or not, ought to be as much the care of the powerful nations of the world as their own interests. And so I say of this soviet government, of which we know so little, if it is the sort of government that one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty million people of Russia want, that is their business and not ours, nor the business of any other government on earth, and, whatever the pretext, no government should intrude itself into their affairs.

Disorder and bloodshed have accompanied every revolution of history. We ourselves passed through a period that one of the great historians has devoted a chapter to, entitled "Anarchy." From the day of the fall of the Bastille, France was drenched in blood. The bloodier a revolution the stronger the evidence that there has preceded it oppression unspeakable. The law of action and reaction is the same, not only in physics but in the affairs of men.

Although at the time I was in possession of what I believe to be reliable facts in the critical juncture to which the Senator from Virginia has referred, I would not, when the war was on, raise any question here or elsewhere concerning the presence of troops in Russia; and yet, under the recognized rules of international law the question might well have been raised. Russia at that time had withdrawn from the war. Other nations at war, for their own advantage, under international law, had no right to take possession of Russian territory, occupy it, and make it a base of operations; but everybody, in the presence of the awful catastrophe which had come upon the world, felt that at that stage matters should take their course.

But, Mr. President, the war is ended. There can be no pretext that the troops of the United States on Russian soil to-day are fighting anybody but the Russian people. Under what rules of international law, tell me, can the military forces of the United States engage in killing in Russia without our Government being held to indemnify the Government of Russia and the people of Russia? This nation and our troops are protected there by no declaration of war. There have been no grounds presented to this Congress, and I venture to say that no grounds can be presented, upon which a declaration of war could be predicated against the Russian people and the de facto Russian Government. But battles are fought, American blood is shed, Russians are killed on Russian soil. Evidently, from the dispatch which I have presented to the Senate, and a later one, which appeared in the morning papers yesterday, desperate fighting is going on there continually. If we have any more lawful right to maintain an army for aggressive warfare—for such is the character of the operation shown by these dispatches—in Russia than we have in China or Japan or any other country, I am most anxious to hear our right in that respect stated and defined, not in general terms, not in phrases that relate to something that occurred or is supposed to have occurred many months ago, when we were at war with Germany, and about which there never has been a syllable of proof furnished excepting the "Sisson papers," over which the slime of chicane and falsification and fraud and forgery is plainly manifest.

When my constituents appeal to me, as they do daily, to explain why their boys, having entered the service of their country to fight the declared enemy of their country, are retained in remote parts of the earth to wage a war not against the common enemy, but against a people with whom we are at peace, I have no answer.

But, sir, those citizens of Wisconsin and of every other State who are asking that question have made the supremest sacrifice for their country, and they are entitled to an answer. I am aware, Mr. President, that these are troublous times. We should proceed with caution and with no more precipitation than the terrible exigencies of the situation require, but in my judgment the time has come when an explanation is due from the administration concerning its purpose in keeping our soldiers in Russia. It is due that we should know by what right they are there and for what purpose they are engaged in prosecuting war.

It is necessary also that the explanation should be couched in plain and direct language so we can understand what it means. If this dispatch which I have read is true, and a number like it have appeared in the press recently, we are to-day making war upon Russia. Are we going to continue to make war upon her or are we not? The people are entitled to have that question answered and have it answered now.

It is no answer to say that the Government of Russia at the present time is unstable or that it is corrupt or that it is unjust. That we do not like the government of a country is no reason for making war upon it. There is no reason at this time for us either to support or oppose the present soviet government of Russia. It may be as bad as its enemies claim or as idealistic as its friends declare. That has nothing to do with the question.

Why should we either condemn or defend the Russian form of government? In the first place we know next to nothing about it, and we are not likely to know much about it while the present censorship continues. We do know, however, from our knowledge of the Russian people gained long before the present war that they are a great, idealistic, hard-working, and liberty-loving people who struggled for many years against one of the worst and most tyrannous governments that ever cursed any country. Yet, sir, these are the people that, so far as we can judge, have organized and are upholding by a great majority the present soviet government. These facts respecting the Russian people should make anyone hesitate to believe the fantastic tales respecting the present Government of Russia.

But aside from all that, whether the Russian Government is good or bad according to our standards it is not for us to attempt to overthrow it. We have enough to do at present right here in the United States and are likely to have for some time to come in making living conditions more tolerable and in restoring peace and prosperity and self-government to our own people. The first step in that process is to withdraw our soldiers from Russia or explain their presence there to the satisfaction of the people of this country.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not purpose to make any address regarding the Russian Government, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this fact:

If the Russian Government had been friendly to the allies, as has been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, I am at a loss to understand why they were unwilling for the allies to have troops at Archangel to prevent that place from being a base for German submarines. The very fact that they antagonized the allies occupying Archangel to prevent it from being held as a base for German submarines to prey upon American commerce, to destroy and sink American transports carrying American boys to fight for liberty in Europe, is conclusive proof that they were unfriendly to the allies.

The Senator implies that they were unable to protect themselves from Germany. Concede that that is true, that they were powerless to protect themselves from German inroads, German invasion, and German power; the allies went to Archangel and put troops there which made it impossible for Germany to occupy and take that place as a base for German submarines. It was known at that time that the German Army was trying to get through Finland. Its fleet was in the Baltic. It had supremacy in the Baltic. Its effort was to break through and get to Archangel, and use it as a base for German submarines. The North Sea had been mined. It became almost impossible to get submarines through there. The English Channel was mined. There was only one place where they could operate against American ships, American transports, American commerce, and destroy the allies as far as submarine warfare could do it, and that was at Archangel.

If the suggestion of the Senator is right, it was the duty of the allies then to wait, to be indifferent, to allow Germany to take charge of Archangel, to make twice as efficient and effective this warfare with the submarines. Why, America would have been recreant to its duty, the President would have been recreant to his duty as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, if he had sat silent and not united with the allies to prevent this great advantage coming to Germany.

That made submarine warfare almost impossible when it was impossible for Germany to get through to Archangel. Unless a person is desirous of letting the allies be powerless in preventing submarine warfare, he should not antagonize the allies taking advantage of the situation and possessing themselves of Archangel.

It would have been a serious mistake; there is no telling what the effect on the submarine warfare during this entire time would have been if Germany could have possessed this base for submarine warfare purposes. There is no telling how many transports carrying American troops would have been sunk by German submarines. No one could tell what was occurring or what would occur in Russia.

Mr. KENYON. That danger is all past now, is it not; and why do we not take the boys out of Russia?

Mr. SWANSON. That brings up the second proposition. As I understand, the troops of the allies which they have in Russia are not sufficient in number to make any offense, except as I understand the offensive has been for their own protection. I might be mistaken about that. I have not looked into it thoroughly, but the general impression I have had is that they only occupied territory around Archangel to a sufficient extent to make it safe and to hold it as such, and that the offensive has been on the part of the Bolsheviki government.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator why do we want to hold Archangel?

Mr. SWANSON. The war is not over.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I want to suggest that there are enormous stores of ammunition and supplies belonging to the allies at Archangel, if my information is correct, and the transportation needed for its removal is not available. They must either protect this property or lose it. They can not very well afford to lose it. I think the fact of the existence of these supplies—and they are there in enormous quantities—is one of the best reasons for remaining there until the property of the allies can be transferred.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any information as to how long we expect to hold that as a base of supplies? Why do we want to keep supplies there now?

Mr. SWANSON. As the Senator from Colorado has said, and as I said in response to the Senator from Wisconsin, we went there for two purposes; to prevent it from being used as a submarine base and because there were large supplies there. We are there, the war is not over; nobody can tell what the conditions in Russia for the future are; there has been no effort, except so far as the Bolsheviki has compelled it, to have offensive warfare, I think. As I understand, the Bolsheviki have been the offensive people. They have been the people that have been trying to drive the American and allied troops from Archangel. I am satisfied that if they would be quiet the allies would be quiet there. I have no authority for saying so, but that is the general impression that I have. The forces there are not sufficiently large for offensive warfare in Russia. The port of Vladivostock and this port of Archangel are the two most important ports and were in considerable danger at the time of the Russian collapse. Germany was trying to get both. We would have been recreant to our duty, recreant to our obligations, if we permitted these vast supplies at these two ports to fall into the hands of Germany, and in addition to that to permit this port of Archangel to be used as a submarine base. It has only been since the 11th of November that the armistice has been signed. Peace has not been made. No one knows now what is the attitude of the Russian Government toward the United States. I notice that a Russian representative or minister to Berlin made a speech the other night, if the reports in the newspapers are true, in which he stated that the Bolsheviki government of Russia should unite with a similar government of Germany to wage warfare against the Anglo-Saxon allies. If that is the purpose, common sense and common patriotism demand that Archangel should be held until we ascertain whether that is true or not. Then, as the Senator so well said, do the Senators here advocate that the troops shall be withdrawn at once and that all these supplies should be surrendered? Are these troops to be brought out sooner than any other troops when it is just as urgent a necessity that they shall be there as elsewhere?

I am satisfied from the number of troops there and from the number of troops in Siberia that it is a matter of defensive and not of offensive warfare against the Russian Government. We sent, I think, about seven or nine thousand troops to Siberia. Twenty-five hundred, I think, is the number of troops furnished at Archangel. I understand Japanese troops are now being withdrawn from Siberia, which is proof that there is no intention of offensive warfare, certainly at the present.

I can remember that Senators and other people in this country were criticizing President Wilson because he did not send a great army to Russia, because he did not send millions of men there to create an eastern line. I remember the criticism was severe, but in this, as in other matters, President Wilson has justified his statesmanship and justified his wisdom. He took the position that the right place to wage the war was on the western line, and not to try to create an eastern line by marching through Russia; that the efforts would be more effective if spent on the western line. That policy has been vindicated, although the subject of criticism at the time. The position he took was to hold these two places, and it seems to me they should be held until this war is settled. If the Bolsheviki government tries to get these supplies, tries to massacre American troops sent over for that purpose, our troops have the right to exercise the privilege of self-defense. I think the Government was right in sending these troops there.

As to what the future purposes are, I am not authorized to speak authoritatively. The Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Polk, will be before the committee. What I mean is that I am satisfied that the American Government having pledged itself to the 14 points raised by President Wilson, which give self-determination to nations, justice and right to all, for which he is battling now and has battled, that this constitutes an assurance that the American troops will be kept nowhere except to carry out the purposes of justice and defend ourselves in the war that I voted for and believe was just. Indeed it was just because civilization was involved, just because American rights were jeopardized, just because American honor was assaulted on the high seas. The very high principles that President Wilson promulgated in Europe ought to be sufficient guaranty to these critics that American troops are sent nowhere except to act for justice, to carry out what he says in his great messages and in his great addresses should be the basis upon which peace should be made in the world.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not rise to criticize the Government in its attitude or policy in connection with this matter. I am not making any contention about any right of any Russian government. I do not question the purpose of this Government in maintaining an army in Russia at this time. But there is one thing I do want to say. The fighting has stopped in France, the fighting has stopped in Germany, but the fighting is in full force in Russia, and the American troops are engaged. We have found it necessary to send these troops there. They are Americans, and they are hopelessly outnumbered, dragging themselves through the snow yonder and fighting a foe overwhelming in numbers. If we have found it necessary to send American troops to Russia, and if our purposes require that they shall be maintained there, then we must support them with an army sufficient to take care of itself in Russia or anywhere else. When I read yesterday morning the account in the papers of American troops being so hopelessly outnumbered and how they were crawling on their hands through the snow and staining it with good American blood, I thought our Government ought to support them and ought to do it now and ought to do it with a force that is sufficient to take care of itself there or anywhere else.

If it is necessary to maintain an army in Russia, we owe it to the army already on the ground to send others there who will maintain this army and protect them and our rights, or we should withdraw the little handful that is there before they are absolutely destroyed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think every Senator has received many letters on the Russian situation. I am not rising especially for the purpose of criticism, but I am rising rather to read into the RECORD extracts from a letter of one of the mothers of these boys in Russia. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]. We have a little force in Russia that will be wiped out by the murderous Bolsheviki. Let us bring them back, or if we are going to do the things that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] says, and if these things are necessary, let us put an army there and do it, and not allow our men to be wiped out by these murderous people. I see no reason why these men should remain in Russia. If they must, let us support them properly; that is the point I want to emphasize.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I understand while we have only 2,500 men the allies have about 15,000, and these were thought sufficient at that time, and are thought so now, for defensive purposes and the holding of Archangel. I do not know and can not state authoritatively that they are outnumbered.

Mr. KENYON. The people of the country are going to get information as to why our troops are in Russia, and the Senate is not going to permit any burial in any committee of a resolution asking for that information.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to ask the Senator a question, which I was tempted to ask the Senator from Arkansas when he was speaking, both of them taking the view that we should at once send a large army into Russia.

Mr. KENYON. Or withdraw the troops we have there.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does it not occur to the Senator from Iowa that it would be a pretty wise thing for us to make a declaration of war before we go any further with this business?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that is true; but the Senator does not get my viewpoint. I do not say a large army. I say we should do one of two things—withdraw these men, or, if they are to be kept there for any purpose, put a sufficient Army there to keep them from slaughter. That is the point I make. I say, however, withdraw them. We are not at war with Russia. Now that peace is in sight, are we to begin all over again with a new war? I say no.

The mothers of the boys who are in Russia are going to be heard. While the letter which I have is rather sarcastic in some places, it is from a woman in my State who has done wonderful work in the Red Cross, who is chairman of the county organization of the Red Cross in her county, who has one boy wounded on the battle fields of France and now in a hospital there, and this other boy of hers, her only remaining boy, is fighting through the snows of Russia, without any authority to put him there that anybody knows of. I have tried to get information from the War Department about this boy. I can not get a word. The cables are so burdened with other important matters just now, even to descriptions of gowns and hats worn at some of the ostentatious displays going on across the sea, that these mothers can not find out about their boys. They have some right to be heard in the Senate, and they are going to be heard in the country. I will not read all of this letter, but here is part of it:

> I trust you will pardon my troubling you again so soon, but I, at least, had the great pleasure of a response, which so far has been denied me by Secretary of War Baker. Perhaps he thinks he has something bigger than mothers' letters to think of, and, no doubt, he is a busy man; but if it were not for we mothers of men he might be under German rule to-day, and we resent silence when all is at stake for us. I wrote Secretary of War and sent him the picture of this dear boy that we are now so concerned about some days before I wrote you. But not one word from Baker. I did not ask anything unreasonable, only what protection did that little handful of men have against those millions, as every paper we pick up some one is protesting that our Army is left there under such dangerous conditions to eat black, sour bread. If it is wise to leave them, why not give them such care as United States gives to our soldiers? My son has not made one complaint of anything, and he does not know I am writing or so worried. Baker tells us to write cheerful letters to our boys. This boy was three months before he heard from home, and we have been that long trying to get a cable through. I gave my boys gladly, and I would not have them out of it one hour too soon, but I feel it is not just for us to be kept in ignorance when we know conditions to be the worst.
> England will not send their men—

That, of course, is a mistake, for wherever there has been the call in any part of the world Britain has responded with her men—

> Why should ours be left there to be slaughtered? I'd like to send Mr. Baker or his boys (if he has any), perhaps then he would begin to think something better be done. And while he is waiting to decide, what of our boys?
> I thought there was only one place worse, and I have never been for one moment reconciled, for I felt it was murder, not war. We are not at war with Russia, and those they try to help don't know if they want them or not. My oldest boy was severely wounded in the last days—26th of October. Adjutant General notified me of this, but, fortunately, I had had four letters from him. He lies in a hospital at Breme, France. It may seem strange when I tell you I can stand this bravely. I'm proud of my boy, who stayed by his gun to the last (Field Artillery, Battery A, Forty-second Division), but when he was wounded he was among white, whole-hearted people, who are caring for him. He asks me not to worry. He's being given the best of care—a good bed, plenty to eat. If it's the Lord's will that he be not returned, I should grieve for him, but there would be no bitterness in my heart, and he died for his country, while with this boy the most bitter resentment would fill my life. But don't misunderstand me; my boy is no better than another mother's boy, if he was the good, noble boy this one is, and if they are protecting them. We know they are not feeding them, but why?

I appeal to you to find out, if you can, if these few men are to be left there to starve or be murdered. Everything may be all right, but it looks bad to me, and I feel I have a right to know. I do not seek his release, as many are, only his care and protection.

I answered her letter——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I am concerned, as well as other Senators, in getting exact information from Russia. In view of the letter which has just been read, perhaps it would not be out of place for me to say that no later than last night we had as our guest a young man who told us that he had heard from his brother, who was at Archangel and was one of the American troops. The letter was written not later than the latter part of November; he gave the date, but I do not now have it in mind. The gentleman stated that his brother spoke in most complimentary terms of the comfort and accommodations they have there. I simply speak of that for what it is worth.

Mr. KENYON. I am very glad to know that, and that may be some comfort to this poor mother who can get no word from the War Department.

The second letter reads as follows:

I have stood up under the stress of this Red Cross and all that goes with it most wonderfully, but this Russian terror and suspense of waiting and wondering why has taken my heart out of the work, or, rather, made me unfit for my position. I am sending you a letter from the Carroll County paper which tells of conditions that are most discouraging. This lieutenant has the same base, but not the company, with my son. I would never know from this son if he was starving. That's one reason why some one else should find out. Trust you will regard me as an anxious, loving mother and not a nuisance to you.

The last letter—and I think as to a portion of what the mother says in this letter the mantle of charity might be thrown over it if anybody has any criticism of it, because it is from a mother's breaking heart who has heard nothing of this boy of hers in months—personally I admire the spunk of the writer:

I read with much interest the demand of Senator TOWNSEND for the Michigan people concerning the Three hundred and thirty-ninth Infantry. It is true most of these men are from Detroit. The captain of this company made a special request—which is not considered allowable—that my son be transferred to his company, which, of course, was very agreeable to him. I notice Secretary of War Baker says he has never heard complaint. Well, perhaps they went where my letter went—to the wastebasket. At least I received no reply. And had he read it he could not have truthfully said what he did. Then he disclaimed knowing of influenza. If such be true, I think it time he began to find out. I think I sent you the letter received from my son, when he said 62 of their men—some of their best—died in four days after landing at Archangel. He also told of their second lieutenant being taken from the barge as they were going up the river and died three days later. I don't believe one of these deaths has been reported. I say again, we feel, and have a just cause to do so, these men were carted off up there without much thought as to what they were going for and forgotten, and some one will be asked, and demand, that we know why. And with all due respect to our President, I think no time should be lost to cable a demand that he pause in his receptions long enough to do something for our boys at once there. We visited Camp Custer a short time before they left for over. A more splendid body of men President Wilson will not meet in all his travel. The whole of Russia would not pay for one of their lives, as it is to-day or ever will be.

Then she speaks of other things and of an attack that her boy had written about long before it was to be made.

Mr. President, I feel that I am simply performing a duty to this mother of one of these boys and to the people of my State who have boys in Russia. They are not asking that any of their sons be relieved from performing any of the real duties of this war. They feel that this war is practically over or at least that the fighting is over, and they do not want these boys of theirs left up amid those snows and the terrors of Russia to meet the terror of bolshevism when it may not be necessary. If it is necessary, all that she asks and that they ask is that those boys have proper care and proper support, and the mothers of this Nation have a right to ask for that. We may well be careful that as this war closes we do not become forgetful of the boys who have made it possible for civilization. I agree with the words expressed here a few moments ago that we have nothing to do with the kind of government the people of Russia have. It is about time to be paying some attention to the United States of America and its people.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Before that motion is put, I wish to ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, the Chair is informed that the bill is before the Senate and that the request of the Senator is not necessary. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, January 9, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 7, 1919.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Huston Thompson to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

R. L. Williams to be United States district judge, eastern district of Oklahoma.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 7, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Come, Thou Almighty, with all Thy holy influence and make us one with Thee in thought and purpose in this epoch-making period in the history of the world.

Intense problems loom large before us and before all the civilized nations. Give us courage, patience, wisdom, strength, that we may uphold right and truth and justice; and guide, we beseech Thee, the great men who have been selected to form a peace pact, that it may unite the men of all nations into brotherly love; that the scenes which we have and are passing through may never disgrace mankind again. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND FUNERAL OF EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

The SPEAKER announced as the committee to attend the funeral of the late Theodore Roosevelt, Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. WEBB, Mr. FLOOD, Mr. DENT, Mr. PADGETT, Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. STEDMAN, Mr. ESTOPINAL, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. MCANDREWS, Mr. GALLIVAN, Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH, Mr. MANN, Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. GILLETT, Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. KAHN, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. MOTT, Mr. HICKS, Mr. CHANDLER of New York, Mr. CANNON, Mr. RODENBERG, and Mr. BOWERS.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, there appeared this morning in a Washington paper a tribute from ex-President Taft upon the late Col. Roosevelt. The tribute is so worthy of the writer and of Col. Roosevelt that I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by inserting an article by ex-President Taft on Col. Roosevelt. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A messsage from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and regret the announcement of the death of Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, late a President of the United States.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of ex-President Roosevelt the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the second resolution the Vice President had appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. REED, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. HARDING, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. CALDER, Mr. JOHNSON of California, Mr. KELLOGG, and Mr. KNOX as said committee.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DRANE, of Florida, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

RESIGNATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., January 6, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to notify you that I have tendered my resignation as a Representative from the fourth district of the State of New York to the governor of the State. The resignation is to take effect immediately.

Sincerely, yours, HARRY HOWARD DALE.

The SPEAKER. Ordered filed among the archives of the House.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WICKERSHAM AGAINST SULZER.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILSON at Louisiana. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending election contest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Alaska contest case. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. When the House adjourned Saturday the previous question was ordered on these resolutions and also on the motion to recommit. Of course the motion to recommit is voted on first and the Clerk will report the motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present. However, Mr. Speaker, I prefer the point should be raised on the vote.

The SPEAKER. That is the easiest way. The Clerk will report the Burnett motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURNETT moves to refer the contested-election case of James Wickersham, contestant, against Charles A. Sulzer to the Committee on Elections No. 1 and said committee shall report on said case by or before February 10, 1919.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 187, answered "present" 1, not voting 112, as follows:

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 131, nays 187, present 1. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. POU. I rise to make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MANN. There is a question pending.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved,

1. That Charles A. Sulzer was not elected a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska in this Congress and is not entitled to retain a seat herein.

2. That James Wickersham was duly elected a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska in this Congress and is entitled to a seat herein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, is it too late to ask for a separation of those two questions?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The question is on demanding the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 229, nays 64, answered "present" 13, not voting 125, as follows:

So the resolutions were agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota (for) with Mr. SLAYDEN (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. SIMS with Mr. LONGWORTH.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND THE FUNERAL OF EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker of the House may be made a member of the committee to attend the funeral of the late President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the gentleman makes that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. POU). The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the name of the Speaker of the House be added to the committee which, by the direction of the House, will attend the funeral of ex-President Roosevelt. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order to-morrow may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the business in order to-morrow may be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RELIEF IN EUROPE.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the participation by the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, and for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President from time to time as necessary, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, in the discretion of the President, $100,000,000, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1919, and which shall be audited where practicable in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government are audited: Provided, That expenditures hereunder shall be reimbursed so far as possible by the Governments or subdivisions thereof or the peoples to whom relief is furnished: Provided further, That a report of the receipts and expenditures under this appropriation shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the gentleman's request.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was for unanimous consent for consideration. I was about to make a statement to the House.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if unanimous consent should be granted, it was my intention, having consulted with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], the ranking Member of the Committee on Appropriations, to ask that two hours and a half be given for consideration, and that at the end of that time the previous question should be considered as ordered and a vote had upon the passage of the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state, I think, that the time is satisfactory to him.

Mr. LITTLE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one question. I notice this relief is confined entirely to Europe. There are several million Armenian Christians on the borders of Europe. How does it happen that they are not included in this measure?

Mr. SHERLEY. The request that came by virtue of the cable from the President to the Secretary of the Treasury, and which was transmitted to the House, and which is found in House Document 1640, confined it to Europe, as the bill does, and in the absence of a specific request for funds to be expended outside of Europe the committee would not feel warranted in going beyond the request.

Mr. LITTLE. Would not the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations accept and agree to an amendment including Armenia?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not feel warranted at this time to announce that I would accept such an amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. The people of this country are being asked for many millions for that purpose, and I think that that neighborhood is more needy than any other.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman's request propose to exclude the opportunity of offering amendments? I did not quite catch it.

Mr. SHERLEY. As submitted, it would simply bring the matter up for a direct vote as proposed. I do not know that I have any special desire to curtail opportunity to offer amendments. It is desired, if possible, to complete the consideration of this bill in time to enable several of us to leave for New York. But, of course, that, while it is a personal reason, is not a sufficient reason for any particular rule.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to finish my inquiry. In view of the fact that Armenia is a Christian people, as much distressed and more distressed than any that will be involved in this measure in Europe, and in view of the fact that more efforts are being made to secure from the people of America by free gifts and contributions aid for Armenia than for any other country, I shall have to withhold my consent unless some arrangement is made to include Armenia in this bill or opportunity to put it in.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will appreciate that I am not in a position to undertake to get unanimous consent by terms such as he proposes. I might be in entire sympathy with the gentleman's proposal, and yet in the absence of more information touching the matter I would not feel warranted, on behalf of the committee, in saying that I would agree to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. LITTLE. I understood the gentleman's request was that this bill should be passed without any opportunity for amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply offered a proposal of that kind. If the House does not desire to do that, why the matter can be thrown open to amendment. I realize both the importance of the matter and the very proper desire of the House to consider it fully. I have no wish to interfere with that desire in any way.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman from Kentucky will modify his request so as to afford opportunity for amendment, I will not object; but if he will not, I shall object.

Mr. SHERLEY. My request, which is pending, is for consideration, and does not involve the question of amendments at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman to say that at the end of the debate the previous question would be ordered.

Mr. SHERLEY. I said I should like to request that. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] state his position touching the matter.

Mr. GILLETT. I have been trying to get an opportunity to do that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that, for one, I am opposed to this resolution, and I suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky—with which suggestion he entirely agreed—that this is a matter of such momentous importance that the House ought to have opportunity for full consideration and debate. Now, I say this in all fairness to the House, so that if there are any Members who wish time against the resolution they may be forewarned: This request has just been presented, and already enough gentlemen have spoken to me to consume the entire 1 hour and 15 minutes which would be allotted to me in opposition; so that if there are other Members, as very likely there may be, who wish time on either side of the House in opposition to the resolution—for in the committee the opposition was not partisan—I shall be unable to give it to them. Therefore, if there are other gentlemen, the time for debate ought to be extended.

Mr. GORDON. I should like 10 or 15 minutes against this proposition.

Mr. LANGLEY. I should like to have some time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In view of the fact that this is a request for unanimous consent, and that it involves a tax of $1 per capita on every man, woman, and child in the United States, for purposes not fully explained, I object. We have a great deal of distress and suffering in the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will reserve his objection for a moment——

Mr. SEARS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will withhold his objection——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not withhold my objection to unanimous consent to take $100,000,000 and give it to people in unknown lands for unknown purposes. The time has come to put a stop to this universal altruism, which takes money out of our Treasury.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I am not asking him to support the bill. I am asking him to withhold his objection in order to allow me to make a statement to the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly, I will do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will try not to delay the House unduly.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not take over five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent that, irrespective of whether individual Members may favor or oppose this proposition, it is of sufficient magnitude and importance to America and to the world to deserve the consideration of the House of Representatives. Now, there are two methods by which that consideration can be secured. It can either be taken up by unanimous consent or it can be made in order under a rule. We are in a short session of the Congress, in which, with our very best efforts to accommodate the various views of Members on different subjects, we will have difficulty in disposing of the most important business. Being personally responsible for the presentation of a considerable part of that business to the House, I should like to save unnecessary work in connection with the consideration of matters that will have to be considered. I think it is easily within the strong probabilities that in the absence of unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, its consideration can and will be made in order by the machinery of a rule. It seems to me that as practical men there is nothing to be gained by forcing the aid of that machinery in order to consider this proposal. I do not want it considered by the House in any way except fully and fairly, and in such manner as to reflect the judgment of the House, and all I desired this morning was to get it up for consideration, and then I would try to adjust the matter of terms to the desires of the House. May I suggest this: Would it meet the views of the gentleman if consent was given to take up the matter immediately after the reading of the Journal upon Thursday? I am willing to agree to any proper debate, and, under the five-minute rule, it would be subject to any germane amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. I suggest to the gentleman that he give the day of Thursday to it. That is not unreasonable in a matter of this importance.

Mr. SHERLEY. My only hesitancy about it is that we are getting well along into January, this Congress will die on the 4th of March, and there are a great many bills of importance to be considered. The Committee on Military Affairs have a number of bills to present, and important supply bills are yet to be considered. I want to accommodate the House. I submit, gentlemen, in all fairness, with a sober appreciation of the responsibility that rests upon us as individuals, that we must all forego somewhat of our natural desire for debate in the consideration of matters if we are to begin to do the business that presses before Congress.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. In regard to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky fixing Thursday for the consideration of this matter, I want to ask him whether or not he would consent that it should be taken up after the disposition of the bill now pending for the settlement of contracts in which a great many American citizens are deeply interested.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will excuse the Chair, the Chair will state that the arrangement is that to-morrow, having dispensed with calendar Wednesday, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] will be recognized to bring in a rule in regard to the bill the gentleman from Illinois refers to.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, we have had that understanding for a number of days, but one thing and another has intervened, and we have got no action. For one I shall object to the consideration of a bill of this character when our own people are so deeply interested in the contract bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman concede that since there is great distress prevailing among families of the soldiers and sailors of the United States who have offered their lives in the service abroad, there is ample business for the President and the Congress to do in the United States without taxing the people another hundred million of dollars to involve us further in foreign affairs?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not desire to take the time of the House now to discuss the merits of the proposal. Sufficient to say that in my judgment this proposal, aside from the humanitarian aspect, which is such that it necessarily appeals to all humane men, has in it to my mind more of value in helping to bring about actual peace in the world and thereby relieve the United States of the burden of war than any proposal likely to come before Congress now or in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it the judgment of the gentleman from Kentucky that the United States should of itself donate this $100,000,000 and to continue to donate other sums for the relief of all the people of all the earth for all time?

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that we ought not to enter into a discussion of the merits of the bill at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Kentucky has stated the sympathetic side, and I am stating that this money comes out of the bone and sinew of the people of the United States.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest to the gentleman that I agree with him entirely that there is pressing business before Congress, and that we all ought to suppress our love for debate as much as we can. On the other hand, I think the gentleman will admit that no more far-reaching and important proposition probably will come before us than this proposition of the United States entering into and becoming the great almoner of the poor of Europe. It seems to me that one day for its consideration will not be too much.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will agree to do this if it meets with the approval of the House: If the bill from the Military Affairs Committee, the contract bill, shall not have been concluded before Thursday, that immediately after its conclusion this bill shall be taken up, with two hours of debate on a side, and that it shall then be read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. I think that is reasonable.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, after the consideration of the military contract bill, if that bill should be pending, and if not, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the bill which I have just had read at the Clerk's desk be taken up for consideration; that there shall be two hours' debate on a side, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and one half by myself; that after the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment and final passage, and that general debate be limited to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that next Thursday, at the conclusion of the military contract bill, if that bill is still pending, or if that is out of the way, as soon as the Journal is read and matters on the Speaker's table are disposed of, this $100,000,000 charity proposition be taken up; that there shall be two hours' debate on each side, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and one half by himself; and that then the bill be taken up for amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this proposition involves an increase of taxation on our already heavily taxed people, and I think they ought to have time to reflect upon it. I object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to serve notice that I shall ask the Committee on Rules for a rule for the consideration of the bill, and I trust that it will be presented to the House on Thursday.

SWEARING IN OF A DELEGATE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I present the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM], who has just been seated by a vote of the House.

Mr. WICKERSHAM appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GREGG (at the request of Mr. SLAYDEN) was given leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, to preside as Speaker pro tempore to-morrow.

PAYMENT OF ALLOTMENTS OF ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take up out of its order the bill (H. R. 13306) to authorize the payment of allotments out of the pay of enlisted men in certain cases in which these payments have been discontinued, and put the same on its passage, with the amendments of the committee. The bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13306) to authorize the payment of allotments out of the pay of enlisted men in certain cases in which these payments have been discontinued.

Whereas in the act known as the act to authorize the establishment of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department provision was made for the payment of allotments to the beneficiaries indicated in a proper authority of allotment by the men enlisted in the military service of the United States; and

Whereas under this provision many enlisted men filed the proper papers authorizing such payments with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance; and

Whereas in these cases and pursuant to this authority payments were regularly made to the beneficiaries up to July 1, 1918, by this bureau; and

Whereas as of that date the payments of allotments not carrying allowances was ordered to be discontinued pursuant to the recommendation of the War Department pending the receipt of a new authority of allotment from the enlisted man; and

Whereas many of these new authorities have never been received by the War Department, owing to the inability of the parties in interest to communicate with the soldiers; and

Whereas the discontinuance of the payment of these duly authorized allotments has operated to the very great detriment and suffering, in many cases, of the allottees: Now, therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That in all of those cases in which an authority of allotment by an enlisted man directing the payment of an indicated amount to a designated beneficiary is on file in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and payments pursuant to this authority had been made by said bureau prior to July 1, 1918, but which payments were discontinued as of that date, the War Department is directed to resume the payments of allotments in these cases, pursuant to the authority on file as aforesaid, pending the receipt of a new authority, or of a written rescision of the old authority, from the enlisted man. In those cases in which, pending the receipt of the new authority, the military authorities, beginning with July 1, 1918, have reserved from month to month out of the soldier's monthly accruing pay the amount directed to be paid by the original authority of allotment, the War Department, upon resuming the payment of allotments in such cases, under the authority of this act, shall pay all arrearages out of these respective reservations.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the bill, but so that we may have a hearing I demand a second.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] 20 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement in connection with this bill, one which I hope will make it abundantly clear why it was necessary that the bill should be introduced, and why it should be passed. Since the introduction of this bill, which was primarily intended to meet the situation arising in my own district out of the action of the War Department, I have received letters from many portions of the United States, showing the suffering of large numbers of allottees arising out of this ill-advised discontinuance of the payment of soldiers' allotments not carrying allowances. There are very many thousands of these cases. Members of this House are doubtless aware that in the act creating the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the soldiers were authorized to make allotments out of their pay to such persons as under the regulations might be designated by them as allottees and that a further provision was made that in case of certain dependents, the Government would supplement this allotment with an allowance. I wish to say in this connection that my bill does not deal with those allotments that carry allowances, but is concerned exclusively with allotments without allowances. It was provided in the act to which I refer, that the payments of these allotments should be made under regulations agreed upon and promulgated by the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of War. These regulations were promulgated, and conformably thereto the payment of allotments was begun in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and continued therein for some time. Prior to July 1, last, the War Department for reasons best known to itself, decided to recommend the discontinuance of the payment of all allotments that did not carry allowances, and to require a new authority of allotment from the soldier. The result of that action has been, as doubtless has been made clear to Members of the House by hundreds of letters from their constituents, that payment of very many of these allotments which was in progress of payment as of July 1 last, was not only discontinued as of that date, but has never been resumed.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Can the gentleman give any reason why the War Department discontinued the payment?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The War Department has never afforded any reason for its recommendation of discontinuance which was satisfactory either to the Members of Congress, or to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which considered this bill. This department gave out a reason to the following effect, that the discontinuance and taking over of the payment of these allotments by the War Department, was rendered necessary by virtue of some supposed amendment to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance Act passed by this body. I undertake to say in this connection that no such amendment was ever passed, and that this House at no time, either consciously, or unconsciously, has done anything which made this action necessary on the part of the War Department.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. This bill provides for the payment of these claims which were discontinued in the War Risk Insurance Bureau and authorized to be transferred to the Quartermaster General of the Army?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The War Department had the right to take over the payment of these allotments. This jurisdiction originally belonged to the War Department, and there would not have been the slightest objection to its taking over the payment of the allotments if, after taking over that jurisdiction, or resuming it on their part, it had continued to make payment in those cases in which payment had begun, and for which sufficient authority was on file in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. This bill relates only to those cases in which actual payments under the authority of regulations promulgated by the War and Navy Departments, were in progress in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The delay was caused by the discontinuance in the War Risk Bureau, directing them to be paid by the Quartermaster General.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In part by the discontinuance of payment in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and in further part by the failure of the War Department to continue the payment of the discontinued allotments. No payments have been made since July 1, except in cases where a new authority has been afforded.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. And they have been unable to get that new authority.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In many instances, they have been unable to do so. Some of the soldiers sought to be reached were in prison, some of them were missing, and some of them were dead. I wish to say that it is a fair estimate to assume that to-day there are from one to five million dollars in the hands of the War Department which have accrued in consequence of this discontinuance of payment. This will give some idea of the extent of this mischief.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have many cases of this kind: A private soldier allotted to his mother, dependent upon him, $15, with the statement that he had contributed that amount. They paid his mother not only that $15 but $15 more, as I recollect the case. The mother was asked subsequently, after 6 or 8 or 10 months, what he had contributed theretofore, and the answer came that he had contributed $25 a month. Now, then, they have stopped paying her and demand that she shall refund the money and are taking his allotment of $15 month by month to reduce that amount that had been advanced to the mother. Does this bill apply to such cases?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, that while I am familiar with cases of the character cited, because I imagine every Member of this body has cases of that sort, this bill does not apply to that situation, for the reason that payments in those cases are still being made in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. This bill applies only to the payment of allotments not carrying allowances, the jurisdiction of which has been assumed by the War Department. I will say to the gentleman that the situation to which he refers is doubtless met by a bill that is now before, if it has not been reported, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and which was introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. This bill does not deal with that situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the phraseology of the measure, would it permit payment of allotments in those cases where since July 1, 1918, the allotments have not been reserved by the War Department?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why in that particular should the Government pay money in cases where the money has not been reserved by the Government from the soldier's pay?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am very glad the gentleman has asked that question, for the reason that it affords the opportunity in this connection to show that the difficulty raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin, is not a real difficulty. If the gentleman will read the bill he will find that the bill relates to two situations of fact. First, to those cases in which the allotment payments were in progress as of July 1 last, and in which the War Department from that time forward, has reserved out of the soldier's pay the amounts necessary to pay the allotments.

Mr. STAFFORD. There can be no objection to that phase of the question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Permit me to conclude. There are many cases of that sort. I have in my pocket now numerous letters written to me by mothers, and other allottees in regard to discontinued allotments, to the effect that their sons have written to them to inquire whether their allotments were being regularly paid, and stating further that the amount necessary for the payment of same was being taken out of their monthly pay. In these cases the gentleman will see that the bill provides that upon the resumption of payment of allotments under the old authority which is now on file in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and which is available to the War Department, it shall pay all arrearages. This is entirely proper, because the money for that purpose is in the hands of the War Department. Now take those cases in which the War Department has not reserved out of the soldier's pay the amount fixed in the original authority of allotment. The bill prescribes that upon resumption of payment, the War Department in these cases shall pay from that time forward, and pay only the amount carried by the authority of allotment. This statement answers I think the query of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is that phraseology? I have read the bill very carefully. I notice in the report the gentleman commented on that phase:

> Since the discontinuance of the payment of allotments on July last, in many if not all of these cases, the necessary amount to meet the designated allotment has been reserved out of the soldier's pay.

Where in the bill does it provide for the protection of the Treasury in the way indicated by the gentleman?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In this way: The bill provides that—> in all those cases in which an authority of allotment by an enlisted man directing the payment of an indicated amount to a designated beneficiary is on file in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and payment pursuant to this authority has been made by said bureau prior to July 1, 1918, but which payments were discontinued as of that date, the War and Navy Departments are directed to resume the payment of allotments in those cases, pursuant to the authority on file as aforesaid.

That is to say, under that authority the department upon the resumption of payments, would pay the monthly allotments only from that time forward. In order to make it abundantly clear that in those cases the department will not pay arrearages, you will notice the following language in the next sentence:

Pending the receipt of a new authority, or of a written rescission of the old authority from the enlisted man. In those cases in which pending the receipt of the new authority, the military authorities, beginning with July 1, 1918, have reserved from month to month out of the soldier's monthly accruing pay, the amount directed to be paid by the original authority of allotment, the War and Navy Departments, upon resuming the payment of allotments in such cases, under the authority of this act, shall pay all arrearages out of these respective reservations.

The two paragraphs taken in connection make it very clear that arrearages are to be paid only in those cases in which the War Department has reserved the amounts necessary to meet them.

Mr. STAFFORD. But under the phraseology of this bill payment may be made to allottees where the allotment is no longer being reserved by the Government?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not think so at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report says it may be payable in such cases. Where is the language to prevent it?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have pointed out that the War Department is to resume payment under and by virtue of existing authorizations which fact, in itself, would carry the idea that the payments would be from that time forward, but in order to make it further clear that arrearages shall not be paid in those cases in which the soldier has been paid his monthly pay in full, the bill directs that arrearages shall be paid in those cases only in which reservations have been made. Any bureau head, or other official who would undertake to pay arrearages under this bill in those cases in which arrearages have not been reserved out of the soldier's pay, ought to be promptly separated from the service of the Government.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman tell the House of the inadequate method employed in informing soldiers that they were required to make a new allotment?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; I will say to the gentleman that under the authority of the original act, hundreds of thousands of soldiers all over the United States filed the proper authorizations with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, directing allotments to be paid out of their pay. Payment of these allotments had begun in many, many of these cases prior to July 1, last. Then when the War Department took over this jurisdiction, which I admit belonged to the War Department, it discontinued payment of every soldier's allotment not carrying an allowance, without regard to what had been in progress before that time. The department took up these cases with the organization commanders at home, and in France, and directed them to call the attention of the soldiers to the fact that a new authority of allotment was necessary. Having in mind the uncertainty of the mails, and the difficulty of reaching the soldiers abroad, and the further fact that many of these organization commanders were carrying very acute responsibilities in connection with the actual conduct of operations in the field, the House will be very well able to understand that there are to-day thousands of soldiers who have not only never filed a new authority of allotment, but who have not been made aware of the fact that it was necessary to file any such authority.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. I am heartily in favor of this proposition, but it occurs to me it might be limited by the language of this bill. I notice in the bill this language:

And payments pursuant to this authority which had been made by said bureau prior to July 1, 1918.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, assuming that the allotment was properly filed originally and that no payments had been made prior to July 1, the application in such a case will not receive attention under the bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is true, and these cases were intentionally omitted because I did not wish to complicate the bill by including any matter with respect to which the War Department might raise difficulties. I have limited the bill to the cases which have been adjudicated, and with respect to which payments were actually in progress on July 1 last.

Mr. DOWELL. Will it not be for cases that have not been paid?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It will not affect them at all. All those cases are now in the War Department. With respect to these cases the soldiers will have to proceed by securing a new authority.

Mr. DOWELL. Should not the bill provide, or should not there be an amendment to the bill providing, that these applications that have been filed should be considered by the department as though filed since that time, and should not those applications, which I know take in a great number, and which will be deprived of having the consideration of the department, have the same consideration by the department?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not think that you should complicate this bill by adding a situation with respect to which there is likely to be controversy. By adding such a situation an excuse for delay will be afforded. If you desire to reach those cases you can do so by another bill. I am not prepared to say with respect to the suggestion made by the gentleman that it ought to be agreed to in this offhand way. The situation outlined in this bill calls for no investigation, because there is no controversy as to the facts.

Mr. DOWELL. There is no question but this bill should pass, but I wanted to include the others.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I desire to say further that I had a hearing on this bill before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and Gen. Lord was there. An effort has been made to fix the responsibility for this discontinuance upon Congress. Doubtless every Member has received letters from the War Department or letters from that department have been forwarded by our constituents, in which it was stated that this discontinuance was due to some act, or amendment on our part. I desire to repeat the statement that I heretofore made, that there is not a line in any bill passed by Congress that made necessary the discontinuance of these payments.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the War Department in the hearing attempt to give the reason why these allotments had been stopped and the payments to the soldiers in some cases discontinued and kept out of the pay of the soldier and in others were paid to the soldier?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That particular feature was not developed, and I wish to say that I have the letter of the Secretary of War that was sent to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In this letter he undertakes to discuss this entire situation and to furnish reasons for the action of the War Department. The amendment that we are supposed to have passed was in June, 1918, and this letter of the Secretary of War relates solely to the legislation of 1917. The act of 1918, as I have stated, could not possibly have made necessary the discontinuance of payments of allotments not carrying allowances, and the claim is not even made in the letter of the Secretary.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman intend to read the letter?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not care to do so. If anyone desires to read it, I will hand it to him. It is a three-page letter. It may be put in the RECORD if anyone wishes that action to be taken.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will.

Mr. ESCH. Had the War and Navy Departments accepted certified copies of the allotments that had been filed with the War Risk Insurance Bureau, would there have been this difficulty?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will say in response to that question, that in every one of the cases covered by this bill there is on file a sufficient authority of allotment in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. All the War Department needed for the purpose of continuing to make payments with respect to any one of these cases, was to secure a copy of the appropriate authorization from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If there are any further questions to be asked, I would like five additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will be very glad to answer any additional questions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman incorporate the letter from the War Department in the RECORD?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the letter to which I referred be made a part of my remarks in this connection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the letter from the War Department be incorporated in his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I find that not all of those who write to me are in that particular difficulty. By what principle do they determine who should be turned over to the War Department and who should yet be retained in the War Risk Insurance Bureau?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That was determined in this way. The allotments that carried allowances were paid in part out of the Treasury of the United States. Hence the appropriate jurisdiction in those cases belonged to the Treasury Department, as the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is a branch of that department; but where the allotment is paid entirely out of the pay of the soldier, the jurisdiction in regard to that case appropriately belongs to the War Department.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Why did they not take over all the allotments paid, then, rather than a part of it?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. As I have stated, the War Department took over the cases which belonged to its jurisdiction, and they were the cases of allotments which did not carry allowances. It could not take over the payment of allotments carrying allowances, for the reason that such cases were within the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. FIELDS. There were a great many cases that were not adjudicated at the time that this transfer was made, although the soldier had been inducted into the service and had filed his application for the allotment. Does the bill under consideration in any way direct the War Department to accept those applications filed with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It does not deal with unadjudicated or possibly controverted cases. It deals exclusively with those cases with respect to which there can be no controversy.

Mr. FIELDS. Would it not expedite the matter to add an amendment to the bill directing the War Department to accept this as proper authority for the consideration of the claims?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I think that such action would complicate the matter.

Mr. FIELDS. I do not see how that can complicate the matter. What is the difference between an application filed somewhere in France and forwarded here and an application filed with the commanding officer of the soldier at the time he enlisted, which went to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance? Either one is a proper authority for investigation as to whether or not the beneficiary is entitled to an allotment, and if the soldier is earning the pay and allots $15 of it a month to his mother or some other dependent or relative, there is not very much controversy about it, and that would result in the settlement of these cases, whereas as the matter now stands, they will probably never be settled.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If the War Department desires to settle such cases it can do so by its own action. I have estimated that of these discontinued cases there must be at least 50 in each congressional district. Many of the Members of the House have told me that this is far too low an estimate.

Mr. FIELDS. I wish there were only 50 in my district.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that in many districts the number is believed to be many more than 50, but I have put it at 50. If there are only 50 to a district, averaging the country through, that would make about 20,000 of these discontinued allotments. If we estimate that the average allotment in these cases would be $10, that would make an aggregate discontinuance of $200,000 a month, and inasmuch as six months have elapsed since this order began to operate, there must necessarily be in the hands of the War Department something like $1,200,000 which ought to have been paid over long since to the allottees of the soldiers. If there are a greater number of these cases in the districts than my estimate assumes, and there are no authentic figures on the subject, the amount due the deferred allottees will be proportionately increased.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be given an additional minute. I want to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in accord with the statement of the gentleman from Virginia. I was present at the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, waiting to be heard on a bill of mine, also an amendment to the War Risk Insurance act, and I now would ask that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] accept the proposition as contained in my bill as an amendment to his bill if it is brought up at the present time for consideration.

The point of my bill, Mr. Speaker, is this: There have been innumerable cases where the War Risk Insurance Bureau or the War Department have asked for a refund from the relatives of the soldier. That refund they have asked under clause 210 of the War Risk Insurance act, which provides for reexamination by questionnaires, or otherwise, as the bureau may direct. Now, those refunds could come about in three different ways: First, by the payment of cash by the people who received the benefit of the allotment and allowance; second, by deducting the amount from the allowances that may in the future be paid or may not up to that time have been paid; and third, by charging it against the soldier's allotment. All three of these methods seem unfair to the soldier, but the third course is the one to which I most particularly object. An allotment from the soldier is nothing more nor less than the soldier's request that his pay be transferred to his relatives through the War Risk Insurance Bureau or through the War Department or Navy Department. It is his absolute pay, and he could have it paid to him direct, rather than paid by the departments if he so desired. Now, then——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TREADWAY. In just one moment, if I may proceed. The War Department or the War Risk Insurance Bureau, if the case preceded last July, has notified people that they would receive no more allowances, and in addition to that say, "Unless you pay back this money in cash, we will charge it against the soldier's allotment." That is what I object to; that the soldier's own pay should be taken for a revision of the allowances already made by the department.

Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to inquire as to the number of the gentleman's bill and whether it has been reported?

Mr. TREADWAY. My bill is H. R. 13273. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] if he would be willing to accept, as an addition to his bill, my bill as an amendment thereto; that is, to incorporate my bill with his?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Has your bill been reported?

Mr. TREADWAY. It has not been reported by the committee, and the reason why it has not been acted upon by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is that they some time ago, at the time of our hearing, asked the War Department for its views on the measure, which have never been submitted. They again asked yesterday for the views of the department. I have had a communication with Mr. Nesbit in reference to the proposition contained in the bill, and I would be glad to submit extracts from a letter I have received from him.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. In a moment. For instance, I read this:

> The discontinuance of the family allowance in cases of this character works a great hardship and causes a great deal of complaint. The bureau, however, has no discretion in the matter because the allowance under the law as it stands does not exist, and therefore can not be paid.

The bureau takes the attitude that it is acting within the law in charging back these amounts against the men paid. I have talked with Assistant Secretary Love, who has had charge of the War Risk Bureau, and he said it was up to the department to execute the law as interpreted by the bureau, but it was up to Congress, if it desired, to change the law. And that is what we should do. The bureau originally made these allowances and allotments and the people accepted the payments in good faith. If future examination on the part of the bureau or the department shows that the allowance should not have been paid, then start your slate from the time of the reexamination. Begin your bookkeeping when they change their ruling, and not charge back over a period of a year or more against the man's pay or allowance which the dependents of the soldier have already expended.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. MANN. I am sorry, but I have promised all my time. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am very much in favor of the passage of this bill. I think it might be well to explain to the House the reasons which were given by the War Department and by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for this transfer. The reasons did not appear to me to be sufficient, and it does not seem to me that the department ought to have ordered the transfer; yet I think the House is entitled to a statement of those reasons, for whatever they may be worth.

You will recall that the war-risk act itself did not confer upon the War or Navy Department the power to retain allotments, nor it did not confer upon soldiers the power to make allotments. That power already existed in the War and Navy Departments. There have been for some years provisions of the law authorizing men in the Army and the Navy to make allotments through the War and Navy Departments, so that the War and Navy Departments already had authority to make allotments to relatives wherever they were designated by the soldier or sailor. The war-risk insurance act did not take that authority from the War Department, but conferred it in addition upon the War Risk Insurance Bureau, so that in the execution of the law the Bureau of War Risk Insurance found itself authorized to deduct these allotments and pay them, and the War Department itself had the same authority. They began to confer one with the other, and by the 1st of July they had arrived at the conclusion that in all cases where the allotment carried no allowance the War Department ought to resume the jurisdiction which it already had independent of the war-risk insurance act, and all of the allotments which were in that situation were turned over to the War Department. The mistake that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance made, and that the War Department made, was in not accepting the allotments made by the soldier originally, and having either a certified copy of that allotment sent from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to the Quartermaster General's office, or having the original papers sent from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to the Quartermaster General's office; and when the question was asked Gen. Love as to why that was not done, he said the Auditor for the War Department took the position that the War Department had no authority to pay an allotment unless it came through the War Department.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. How many claims are pending affected by this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. My recollection is that the estimate of Gen. Love, who had charge of this matter, was that there were something over 200,000 claims of this sort that were affected, but that the increase in the number of allotments that came through the War Department following the issue of this order amounted to something like 200,000; and they were only able to account for this additional 200,000 by assuming that they were reallotments, made by the soldiers who had been able to receive the notices which they sent out; but it is very probable that there are 20,000 to 25,000, or perhaps more, who are affected by this bill, where the men in France or in Russia or in Belgium or Italy or in hospitals or German prison camps were never able to receive the notices and are still under the impression that their relatives are receiving the allotments, whereas they are not receiving them.

Mr. McFADDEN. So that there are probably a quarter of a million dependents who are not receiving the allotments which have been made to them by soldiers?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; there are not a quarter of a million, because probably 200,000 have made new allotments, and that would leave perhaps twenty-five to thirty thousand soldiers whose allotments are not being received by their relatives.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. IGOE. Did the Quartermaster General on July 1 allow this $15 to go back on the man's pay, or did he continue to hold it out in all cases?

Mr. BARKLEY. They held it for a reasonable time, as they estimated it, to give the soldier a chance to make a new allotment, and where they did not receive the new allotment they began after a while to pay him the full pay.

Mr. IGOE. What did they do with the pay that they had held up? Did they pay it to him?

Mr. BARKLEY. They paid it to him after the 1st of July. There was no back pay prior to that date.

Mr. IGOE. That which they had held up?

Mr. BARKLEY. If they held up the July pay and the August pay, then, in September and October, if they did not receive a new allotment, they assumed that the man did not intend to make a new allotment and paid him the back pay. Perhaps in some cases, where they have not been able to reach the man, they have not paid it, but the War Department takes the position that in all these cases where they have been able to reach the man and no new allotment has been made it is not his intention to make a new allotment, and they have paid him the entire amount of his pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the intention to pay the beneficiary or allottee money that has not been reserved?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. That would seem to be so from the phraseology of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not the intention, and I think there should be added these words, page 2, after the word "cases," in line 11, "from the passage of this act," or some words like that, so as to indicate that it was not retroactive as to allotments not held in reserve.

Mr. STAFFORD. There should be some such amendment in order that there shall be no double pay.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Has the gentleman seen a letter from the War Department saying that the action was due to some kind of amendment to the war-risk act passed by Congress?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I have not seen it; but I have received word from several Members who have received some such letter. I do not know who sent such a letter. There was no amendment to the War Risk Bureau act that would warrant that. It was an administrative matter worked out by the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the War Department.

Mr. DENISON. I have received a number of such letters.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not undertake to say just where the blame lies, but it has been a gross and burning outrage that under such legislation as was enacted, under the administration efforts of various departments, men who were enlisted in the Army, either by voluntary enlistment or under the selective-draft law, were told that they could allot a part of their pay to help sustain dependents upon them while the soldiers were away from home, either in camp training in this country or on the other side in the fighting line or in training there, and having been told that and having made the allotment and having had the amount of their allotment deducted from their own pay, after fighting over there, coming home, such as have come home, and others who want to come home, find out that this great and good Government of ours lied to them, has not kept faith with them, has not kept the promises which were made to them—that having deducted the amount from their own pay failed to make the payment to the mother or the father or the brother or the sister or the children, as it might be, who were dependent upon them for support. These people at home, or some of them, have suffered for food; many have suffered for raiment; many have suffered for heat; and many have been taken care of as a matter of charity by their neighbors or the Red Cross.

During a long experience in this House I have discovered that a great duty of the executive branch of the Government is not to do a thing but to give excuses why it does not do it. Here the War Risk Bureau was making the payments, theoretically, and if they made them regularly they did better than they are doing now, and somebody transferred the making of the payments to the Quartermaster General's office of the Army, and while the Quartermaster General's office of the Army knows enough about it to deduct the amount of the allotment from the soldier's pay, it does not know enough about it to warrant it to pay the amount deducted to the dependent parents. Nothing more ridiculous could be imagined. Somebody ought to be blamed for it. This bill seeks to cure it as a legislative proposition. I do not know, but I assume that probably it does not require legislation. It is proper to have legislation because that is a direction. We ought to go further. I appreciate the great trouble of developing a wonderful, complete organization in a short time. No doubt the War Department had a tremendous responsibility in developing this organization. The War Risk Insurance Bureau had a great responsibility in developing its organization. Both of them have miserably failed, so far as the payment of soldiers' allotments to their dependents is concerned. It is a disgrace to a civilized community that we are about to consider a bill to appropriate $100,000,000 for the benefit of the poor in Europe—I think we ought to pass that bill—while at the same time we have not developed the machinery to pay the money to the poor people at home who under the law are entitled to it as a part of the pay which the Government has provided for its men in the military service. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the bill as it now stands the words on page 2, line 11, after the word "cases," the words "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it not be as well to insert the provision that only where the allotment has been withheld?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to make the language he has just stated a part of the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Page 2, line 11, after the word "cases," insert the words "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not think that would add anything to it and I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it not be as well to have it apply only in cases where the allotment has been reserved or withheld? It is not intended to pay double, it is only intended to pay where the money has been withheld out of the soldier's pay, and yet here is a direction on the part of Congress to pay in cases where the money has been paid back to the soldier.

Mr. BARKLEY. That might carry the implication that the War Department would pay back only that which has been withheld and the intent is to resume these payments from month to month in the future.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that would add anything and I therefore object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to make the proposition that the Clerk will read a part of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section the following:

"Provided, however, That whenever the commissioner shall by further investigation or reinvestigation modify the existing award, no reimbursement from the person receiving an allowance shall be required for allotments and allowances already paid nor shall any deductions be made from allotments and allowances to be paid in the future for any change in award made in previous allotments and allowances."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether under the phraseology of the amendment just offered it would not legalize the payments made under fraudulent representations. There have been called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance numerous instances where persons have perpetrated fraud on the Government in receiving these allowances. By this phraseology you would prevent the Government from obtaining money back which has been unlawfully paid, and for that reason I object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold it for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the following amendment:

In line 14, page 2, after the word "cases," insert the word "only."

I understand the gentleman from Virginia is willing to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to having the word "only" inserted?

Mr. MANN. Let it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DEMPSEY offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 14, after the word "cases," insert the word "only."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman to tell us what that means. I am not always able to catch what the insertion of a negative means at first blush.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin has raised an objection that under this bill there might possibly be payments made of arrearages where the arrearages had not been deducted from the soldier's pay. To make it clear that the payment of arrearages shall be made only where they have been actually deducted, I put in the word "only," which, it seems to me, more clearly confines it to the cases contemplated, which are those where the arrearages have been actually deducted.

Mr. MANN. But the bill apparently only authorizes payment where the amount has been reserved.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think myself that the bill is plain without the insertion.

Mr. MANN. The most dangerous thing I know of where you have a matter that is fairly clear is to insert a negative. I do not myself deem that it is necessary. There is a constant query about the meaning of double negatives. Most people who use them do not mean an affirmative, yet they say that it constitutes an affirmative.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I agree with the gentleman. I think the language is plain without the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Then I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman have any objection to modifying his motion so as to strike out the whereases?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the whereases in this case recite a state of facts which makes it abundantly clear to anyone why the bill is necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. The whereases should be a part of the report, but not a part of the permanent statutes of the country.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill, the amendments being a part of it.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

INVESTIGATION OF LIGNITE COAL.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products, as amended by the Committee on Mines and Mining of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The gentleman from Arkansas moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make experiments and investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals to determine the commercial and economic practicability of their utilization in producing fuel oil, gasoline substitutes, ammonia, tar, solid fuels, gas for power, and other purposes; and there is hereby appropriated, out of the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, to conduct such experiments and investigations, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and including supplies, equipment, expenses of traveling and subsistence, and for every other expense incident to this work.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to sell or otherwise dispose of any property, plant, or machinery purchased or acquired under the provisions of this act, as soon as the experiments and investigations hereby authorized have been concluded, and report the results of such experiments and investigations to Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin 20 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that this proposition was discussed very fully on another bill a few weeks or a couple of months ago, when a similar item was included in a bill which passed the Senate and which subsequently was abandoned in the Senate—one of the war bills. The bill as it passed the Senate included peat, and one of the House amendments is to cut out peat. The bill as it passed the Senate provided $150,000 as a fund. The House amendment cut the fund down to $100,000. In addition to that, the House committee proposed an amendment as a new section, section 2:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to sell or otherwise dispose of any property, plant, or machinery purchased or acquired under the provisions of this act as soon as the experiments and investigations hereby authorized have been concluded, and report the results of such experiments and investigations to Congress.

Now, broadly speaking, the object of the bill is simply to do this: To enable the Department of the Interior to conduct certain experiments, or, rather, to demonstrate by the establishment of plants that which laboratory experiments have already demonstrated, the feasibility of developing the lignite coal deposits of this country which constitute one-third of the coal deposits of the United States. There are something like 7,000,000,000 tons estimated in Alaska alone of lignite. There is a great deal more of these lignite deposits upon Government land that still remains as part of the public domain. Now, as I said, the laboratory experiments which have been conducted have all demonstrated the feasibility of the use of these lignites not only as fuel but in the carbonizing of lignite to develop oils and other matters contained in them which have a high commercial value. Now, some objection was offered once before on this proposition on the ground that it was a paternalistic proposition, but it is just the contrary. The object of this bill is to demonstrate the commercial practicability so that private enterprise will be induced, as it is in other countries, to take up the lignite deposits of our country. Now, the question may be asked why, if other countries have developed the commercial operations by which their lignite deposits are utilized in a practical commercial way, we can not benefit by their experiments and use the processes which they have developed. The reason for it is this: The lignite deposits of this country are in a different state of development from those in Germany, in Canada, and in other countries where they have developed practical processes. And you understand lignite is just a condition of development of coal from the original state; it has not yet reached the highly developed state which produces bituminous or anthracite coal. Now, in Germany their lignite had proceeded to a natural development to an extent that is different from the lignite of the United States. They found by laboratory experiment that it was a commercial and practical proposition, and the Government expended money to demonstrate it to the commercial interests of Germany, and the result was to make the status of the lignite of that country for fuel; and the development of the gases and the oils of the lignite deposits of Germany constitute the base of the German monopoly for dyestuffs up to the time the war opened. Now, those of you who have read the report will find on page 5 of the report listed under six different subheads the uses and the qualities which are contained in lignite and which we wish to develop to commercial use.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield before going from that?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I notice what seems to me rather a singular omission in the language of the bill. It nowhere states where these investigations are to be carried on. They are not limited to the United States and they do not include the Territories, and it seems as if this is left open for the investigation to be carried on anywhere in the world. Of course, I suppose there is no intention or purpose but that under the terms of this bill these operations shall be carried on anywhere except in the United States and its Territories?

Mr. WINGO. The hearings before the committee and the information I have lead me to the conclusion, perhaps, that they will establish one plant in one of the Dakotas—North Dakota. Now, the question raised had not occurred to me before, and I will frankly state I do not think there is any intention to go outside of the United States, unless it is necessary for the investigators for the purpose of comparison to go into Canada, the Saskatchewan district, where they conduct similar work.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course, I suppose the principal lignite deposits that are likely to be beneficial are in Alaska?

Mr. WINGO. No; the gentleman is mistaken there. I should think——

Mr. TOWNER. The Matanuska fields or the lignite fields south of Fairbanks are——

Mr. WINGO. There are great deposits in Alaska.

Mr. TOWNER. The largest lignite fields in the world?

Mr. WINGO. They are the largest individual deposits. Take the deposits of the West and Southwest together, I think possibly they outrank in volume any known deposits of Alaska, although Alaska has the largest single deposit of lignite in the world.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to ask the gentleman another question. Of course, there is a very great deal of difference with regard to the different lignite coals. It does not mean an absolute uniform and valuable fuel producer. There are various degrees of lignite just as there are of bituminous coal and of varying value. Is it the purpose of this bill to allow investigation to be made of various fields and reports to be made regarding their comparative value?

Mr. WINGO. No; I will state to the gentleman, if the gentleman will pardon my interrupting, I have only a few minutes, I promised to yield some of my time—and I would like to be notified when I have used 10 minutes—I will say this to the gentleman. The object we are seeking to do is this, because we have practically located these different lignite fields.

But the object of this is to follow up the laboratory experiments and by putting in a small plant demonstrate from a commercial standpoint the feasibility and the practicability as a profit-making proposition of the utilization of these lignite deposits. That is the object, and the sole object.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman think that the amount, $100,000, for that purpose is somewhat large?

Mr. WINGO. No; I think not.

Mr. TOWNER. If it is merely the object by chemical experiment to determine the value of lignite for the purpose of using it, it seems to me that is a large amount.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think you could test out the plants for $100,000. I think that amount is too small. I think it should be $150,000.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used nine minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, so that we may have further information concerning this bill, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota before I speak in opposition to it.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill proposing an appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars to be used for experiments and investigations to be carried on by the Bureau of Mines for the purpose of determining and demonstrating the feasibility and commercial practicability of carbonizing and briquetting lignite coal. This Senate bill as amended by the Committee on Mines and Mining is substantially the same as the bill H. R. 12192, which I introduced in the House on this subject and on which bill hearings were held before a subcommittee of the Committee on Mines and Mining on June 7 of this year. During the past 15 years there have been carried on in the Northwest, and in the State of North Dakota particularly, a series of experiments and investigations to determine the commercial and economic practicability of using lignite coal and its by-products. During that time there has been a great deal of private capital put into different plants constructed for briquetting lignite coal on a commercial basis. In practically every case so far the investments in these briquetting plants have been commercial failures. For the most part the men who ventured in this work of the briquetting of lignite coal and the manufacture of by-products from the briquetting process did not have either sufficient capital or information on the subject of briquetting lignite to carry on the work to a final and commercial success.

The Bureau of Mines now represents that it can with this appropriation demonstrate to the commercial world that the briquetting of lignite coal and the use at the same time of the by-products of this coal are practical and feasible from a commercial point of view. The bureau intends to use this money in cooperation with some private plant that has already been established either in North Dakota, Colorado, or Texas.

Let me again call your attention, gentlemen of the House, to the immediate and tremendous importance of developing this great natural resource of our country—lignite coal. It is estimated that in the United States there is more than a trillion tons of lignite coal; more than one-third of all the coal in the United States and Alaska is lignite coal. Let me particularly mention just one feature of the possibilities in the development of this low-grade coal. Investigations that have already been made show that as a by-product from a ton of lignite coal there can be secured about 4 gallons of light oils that can be used in internal-combustion engines. This means that the light oils from lignite coal, and that can be secured from it in briquetting processes, are sufficient to meet the needs of the United States for 150 years, whereas the known or estimated amount of gasoline that can be secured from the petroleum fields of the country will only meet the demands of the United States for about the next 25 years. That is one important feature of this work that will be more fully presented to the country by the experiments and investigation to be carried on under this proposed appropriation.

Another great feature is the transportation problem. To-day there is being shipped from Ohio and from other distant fields more than 7,000,000 tons of bituminous coal to the State of Minnesota.

If this lignite coal industry is developed, if the way is pointed out by the United States for private enterprise to engage in this industry, as I believe it should be, instead of transporting coal 1,500 or 2,000 miles into Minnesota it will be brought down there from the great coal fields of North Dakota, which are distant only a few hundred miles. That alone will mean a great economic saving in transportation. It will also allow of needed conservation of coal in Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, where the coal fields are being rapidly exhausted. To-day throughout North Dakota there can be seen fields of this coal varying in depths from 20 to 40 feet. One of the principal items in any after-war program for progressive development in this country should be the development and expansion of the use of lignite coal and its by-products. Up in Canada they have recently appropriated $400,000 to develop the use of lignite coal there. Have we not every reason to do more to develop the use of this product in the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. NORTON. I want to add that I believe that as a conservation measure that this is one——

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota two minutes.

Mr. NORTON. That this is one of the most important measures that have come before this great Congress, which has had so many great measures before it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. NORTON. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What I am trying to get at is, Is there machinery at present under the Bureau of Mines by which this investigation can be made?

Mr. NORTON. The bureau has practically all the machinery that is needed. It can secure machinery for this purpose, or nearly all it will need, I know, in my State.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Have they made any of these tests? Has any bureau of the Government made any of these tests so that information is available?

Mr. NORTON. Yes; test experiments and investigation have been made in the laboratory and field work for a number of years.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why is it necessary to make this large expenditure at this time for this investigation? Perhaps I did not notice your argument closely enough, but in a few words I would like to have you explain why it is necessary to appropriate this sum now?

Mr. NORTON. The bureau estimates that it will need this amount to establish a briquetting plant for the manufacture of lignite briquettes and by-products. Through the establishment of such a plant and its successful operation the bureau promises that it will demonstrate to the commercial world that it is practical to put upon the market at a profit these briquettes and the by-products of lignite coal given off in the manufacture of the briquettes, these by-products being light oils, tars, and gas.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman have any idea of where the department expects to locate this plant?

Mr. NORTON. I have no definite idea. I think they will locate the plant, although they have not so stated, either at Hebron, N. Dak., in connection with the Bureau of Mines station of the State of North Dakota, or at Minot, N. Dak., where there is a private briquetting plant at the present time, in which a large amount of money has been invested.

Mr. LOBECK. The lignite fields extend into Wyoming.

Mr. NORTON. They extend from Canada down through the Dakotas and into Colorado and into Texas. There are some very large fields in Texas.

Mr. LOBECK. I have seen 30 or 40 foot veins in Wyoming.

Mr. NORTON. Along the Missouri River one can see for miles many coal seams or veins having a thickness of 20 to 40 feet. It would be very unwise statesmanship to fail at this time to have the Federal Government take action such as proposed in this bill for the development and use of these great coal fields.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 13 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, here we have an example of the Government going wild in Government ownership. I contend that with the authority the Bureau of Mines now possesses, similar to the authority possessed by the Bureau of Standards, of making laboratory tests to determine the practicability of these various by-products of lignite coals, it is unwise as now proposed by this bill that the Government should go into the business of establishing a commercial plant. Originally they sought $150,000, and now $100,000 is sought by this ambitious Bureau of Mines. If it were for the purpose of merely laboratory work, I would not rise here to oppose it, but when the Government for the first time in its history is attempting to establish a commercial plant to demonstrate to the country at large whether it is economical, practical, and profitable to sell these by-products, I say in these piping times of peace we should call a halt. Perhaps to the gentlemen who compose the Bureau of Mines $100,000 is not much, but hundreds of thousands of dollars run into millions. They admit that investigations that have been made show that lignite can be made into briquettes; investigations show that oil can be extracted from lignite. Yet the report admits that the one purpose of this appropriation is for the Government to establish a commercial plant to determine whether it is commercially feasible. Section 2 embodies that idea of the purpose and provides that as soon as the plant is established and it is shown that the commercial project is a failure then authority is granted to them to dispose of the plant.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not just at this time. In the estimate—and, of course, I know, because I, too, have had experience of some time in this House with bureau chiefs and know that they are inclined to expand their activities—in this estimate of $100,000 they want $10,000 for a building for a commercial laboratory. Of course $10,000, when we are going to appropriate $100,000, is not much. Then they want $10,000 additional for a tar still, tar being a by-product of lignite. Then they want $19,000 for salaries of experts, and all manner of estimates are provided for, including carbonizing ovens, a by-product, $25,000.

It is not necessary for the Government by experiment to spend $25,000 for the establishment of carbonizing ovens. They can go to any industrial center of the country where they are extracting by-products from soft coal and manufacturing coke, and they will see there the processes of extraction without the Government wasting $25,000 in that particular.

Mr. WINGO. Is the gentleman talking about carbonizing lignites now? What has the coke proposition to do with it?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is akin. This process, as the gentleman himself has admitted, has been demonstrated to be practical in Germany, and I am informed also in France. Yet you want the Government now, in these times when we need money so badly, to establish a plant out in North Dakota and Alaska or somewhere else.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I am interested in the discussion of the coke activities of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not say anything about the coke activities of the Bureau of Mines at all. I said anybody acquainted with the commercial and industrial activity in the manufacture of coke would know that it is not necessary for the Government to establish carbonizing ovens to obtain a knowledge of that product.

Mr. WINGO. That may be true, but the items that the gentleman is reading will come up for appropriation in Pennsylvania and Illinois and possibly Arkansas. But none of it has to do with lignites.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman seems to be all wise about this subject when he says it has not anything to do with lignite. I will read the estimate. It says, "Lignite investigations, Bureau of Mines, $100,000."

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman read about the coke ovens.

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield further, because I can not afford to have all the time taken up by the gentleman in attempting to give information that he does not have. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury says that this is for lignite investigations of the Bureau of Mines, "for investigations of lignites, to determine the commercial and economic practicability of their utilization in producing smokeless fuels for household and industrial uses, gas for domestic and power purposes, nitrogen products for refrigerating or fertilizing purposes, fuel oils for furnaces and internal-combustion engines, and so forth, creosoting oils, benzene, toluene, and other materials required in the manufacture of dyestuffs and explosives and related chemical products, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, but not exceeding 20 per cent to be expended for such services in the District of Columbia, $100,000."

In specifying the expenditure of that $100,000 the Secretary of the Treasury has enumerated how that money is to be expended, and we find in the way of equipment, carbonizing ovens, a by-product, $25,000 is estimated; and yet the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has the temerity to rise here when he reports the bill, in a report covering many pages—10 pages—and say this $25,000 is not for the purpose of experimentation, so far as lignites are concerned. I know there are lignite deposits down in Arkansas, and I know there are lignite deposits up in North Dakota, and I know that there are some in Alaska and in Texas, and I am not surprised that the Representatives of those States are coming here and trying to reach their hands into the Treasury to get $100,000 for the beginning of an industrial and commercial establishment. I say we should enter a protest here and now at this time against this extravagant policy of going into the business of establishing private plants to determine whether it is commercially and industrially advantageous to extract these various by-products from lignite coal.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserves four minutes and a half.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Gentlemen of the House, I do not think the fears of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] are well founded. Section 2 was placed in the bill by the House committee in order to meet the situation he suggested. The purpose of this act is not to establish a commercial plant, but to demonstrate to the commercial world that this lignite can be utilized. If the lignite that is now known to be available in this country can be briquetted and made into a commercial fuel, the fuel supply of the country will be increased by a third. It can not be successfully briquetted unless the valuable by-products are reclaimed and utilized. The by-products themselves are very valuable and very much needed. Now, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the Bureau of Mines to conduct experiments for the purpose of demonstrating that by saving and utilizing the by-products lignite can be made into a cheap but valuable fuel coal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. DENISON. Oh, I am a member of the committee, and was present during the consideration of the bill, and know all about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was stated that that was the purpose, to establish a commercial plant.

Mr. DENISON. It is only for the purpose of establishing a plant to develop the by-products, in order to demonstrate to the business interests of the country that this lignite can be utilized commercially. Now, the Committee on Mines and Mining, I think at my own suggestion, put this section 2 into the bill in order to anticipate and avoid the suggestion that the gentleman from Wisconsin has made, that this is a Government ownership experiment. This second section of the bill makes it mandatory upon the Bureau of Mines, after they have gone ahead and made their experiments and developed the lignite as far as they can under the appropriation, to dispose of any plant or other property that they may acquire in making the demonstration and make a report of their experiments and demonstrations to the Congress. So that this money will be taken by the Bureau of Mines and used to demonstrate to private individuals and to the business interests of the country whether or not lignite can be developed and made a merchantable product. In order to do that you have got to develop the by-products. The Bureau of Mines has not now the necessary machinery or funds to do that. They told the committee that when lignite is properly briquetted it becomes a clean fuel, with the same heat value as anthracite coal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman cite any instance where the Government has undertaken a similar work in the development of any other natural resource?

Mr. DENISON. I am not able to do so, because I am not familiar with all the activities of the Government. Inasmuch as there is an immense quantity of this lignite in this country, which is being used in Germany and other countries, the committee thought it was at least worth the attention of the Government, and that this amount of money might well be used to demonstrate whether or not this product can be used commercially in this country. That is the reason why we approved of the bill. I think section 2 protects the Government and the people against any effort on the part of the Bureau of Mines, or anyone connected with the bureau, to try to put the Government into the business, because after the bureau has made the experiment and demonstration the bill compels the bureau to dispose of the plant and go out of the business. If the Government can demonstrate to the business interests of the country that lignite can be economically made into a good commercial fuel, we will have made a valuable investment in expending the amount authorized in this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Arkansas has nine minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin four and a half minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I suggest to the gentleman that he use his time now.

Mr. STAFFORD. There will be only one speech. Will there be only one on the other side?

Mr. WINGO. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to say only just a word or two in explanation of this bill. I think perhaps I ought to say that in all my experience here I have never approached the study of a proposition with as little preconceived opinion or anything that might influence or prejudice me for or against a proposition as I have the study of this bill. When the matter came up I hardly knew that there was such a thing as lignite. I knew absolutely nothing about it. There is none of it anywhere in my section of the country that I know of, and therefore I was prepared to study the question with an open mind. I have tried to give this matter pretty careful investigation and study. I believe that it is a question possessing a great deal of merit from many standpoints. Unquestionably there is nothing in the apprehension voiced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. There was no idea or intention on the part of the Committee on Mines and Mining to have the Government go into anything that would savor of Government ownership.

Briefly this state of facts exists: North Dakota, through her university, has been making some experiments in the treatment of the lignites and has equipped a kind of plant for carrying on that work. Now, as I understand, the Government is proposing to join with them in this work of demonstrating the feasibility and practicability of the treatment of lignite in a commercial way. Now, the proposition as I understand it is, if this small appropriation is made, for the Government to join with the authorities of North Dakota and perhaps some other places in the country and erect a plant, putting in the necessary ovens and machinery to demonstrate physically the feasibility of treating these lignites in such a way as to induce private capital to take up the work on a large and commercial scale.

The Bureau of Mines believes that the by-products can be made to pay more than the expense of the treatment of coals. After separating the by-products it is the intention to briquette the carbon. Then you will have a fuel that is about equivalent to anthracite in heating units. It was testified before the committee that the experiments conducted so far have convinced the experts that after you have extracted the by-products, the oils, the tars, gases, and so forth, all of which are valuable and are badly needed in this country, the fuel part, the carbon, can be briquetted and placed on board the cars at $4.50 a ton, and having a heating capacity equivalent to that of anthracite. If that can be done, that thing alone will be worth many millions of dollars to the people throughout the United States.

But aside from that, we all recall that in the beginning of this war we were told that we could not buy clothing of as good quality as we bought before, because of our inability to manufacture the dyes that would hold their color, and so forth, and that because these things had come from Germany heretofore and we were to be deprived of them, we were forced to use inferior stuff in the way of clothing. I believe that great benefits will come from this horrible war just closing, and I believe that one of those benefits arises from the fact that it has been necessary for us to develop the resources of our own country. This is one step in that progress. If the experiment which the Government is now proposing by this bill will have the effect, as we believe that it will, of demonstrating that we have in this country the materials for the much-needed dyes used in manufacturing, that alone will compensate for the little money herein authorized and for all the time and energy expended in the experiment. Then add to that the tons of first-class fuel which can be added, at low prices we hope, to the fuel supply of the country, and the benefit will be almost incalculable.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. For a question; yes.

Mr. MANN. I see there is nothing in this bill that says anything about briquetting. Is it the intention or is there any authorization for the Bureau of Mines, if it conducts these experiments, to sell any of the products of the experiments?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think not. That will not be the prime purpose of the Bureau of Mines. They will not go into it for the primary purpose of selling the products.

Mr. MANN. What will they do with them?

Mr. HAMLIN. I was going to say, if this becomes a law, they will put in a plant, as I understand, in conjunction with one partially erected.

Mr. MANN. They have sent in an estimate for a plant but not in conjunction with any other.

Mr. NORTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that it is the intention of the bureau to sell the briquettes that they manufacture.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was going to further answer the gentleman that in the conduct of these experiments, not for the purpose of selling anything to make money, but in conducting these experiments, they will make some briquettes and will likely sell the briquettes that they make. But it is not the purpose of the bill to have the Government manufacture briquettes for sale. The purpose is to demonstrate to the business interests of the country the practicability and the feasibility of private capital going into the business on a large commercial scale.

Mr. MANN. I understand that from the gentleman's statement, and I would not interrupt him until he had passed that point. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to sell or otherwise dispose of any property, plant, or machinery purchased or acquired under the provisions of the act as soon as the experiment and investigation have been concluded. Would not that apparently forbid them to sell any of these products?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is perhaps possible that section 2 ought to have gone further and provided for the sale of any products that they have on hand when they cease investigation.

Mr. DENISON. I will suggest that the Government has ample use for all briquettes that are manufactured.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask the gentleman from Arkansas if there will be only one speech in conclusion on that side?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know——

Mr. STAFFORD. It is customary to have the opposition close when only one speech is to be made on the other side.

Mr. WINGO. Is the gentleman addressing his remarks to me? I know what is customary, and if the gentleman had understood me he would understand the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman from Arkansas would be courteous enough to comply with the usual custom.

Mr. WINGO. I do not require any instructions from the gentleman from Milwaukee as to courtesy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). Gentlemen are out of order.

Mr. WINGO. I call the gentleman to order, and want to say that I require no lesson in courtesy from the gentleman from Milwaukee.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not appreciate the courteous remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, this bill is the launching of a Government plant into the manufacture of by-products of lignite, and there is no escape from that conclusion in reading the bill. It is not limited in its expenditure to $100,000, but when once the bill is passed authorizations for unlimited amounts can be presented to the Appropriations Committee. No one need to delude himself that they are going to conclude these investigations in a short time. That is not what the Bureau of Mines does. They want to have a plant established and go into the business of making the by-products of lignite. They wish to establish this plant somewhere and then come to Congress for increased appropriations. This is purely a Government-ownership proposition. I am not surprised that it emanated from North Dakota, and I am not surprised that North Dakota is launching into the project, because North Dakota has the reputation for that character of experiment and investigation. If North Dakota wants to do it, let it take the responsibility. The Congress of the United States ought not at the present time to undertake this character of work. It is purely a proposition of Government ownership. There is no limit to the amount of money that may be expended. It is true that only $100,000 is appropriated, but, as the gentleman from Illinois has explained, there is no authority for the disposition of the products. There is authority to dispose of them after the investigation has been concluded. But when will the experiment be concluded? If the Bureau of Mines did not have the authority to investigate this subject, I would not rise in opposition to a laboratory investigation. This is something more. It is the first time in the history of the Government that a bureau has called upon the National Government to go into the manufacturing business. Where will the limit be to that character of governmental activity?

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I notice in line 5 the bill provides for the investigations of coal and peat.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had been here he would know that the bill now is limited to lignite, under the amendment of the committee. If we go into the investigation of lignite coal why not have the Government go into every character of mineral deposit and determine whether it is advisable to commercially manufacture its by-products? If you are in favor of Government ownership, if you are in favor of something that is chimerical, if you are in favor of something that has not been established successfully, this is a good way to show the abuses and waste that follow from Government ownership.

Again I wish to emphasize that this is no time to enter upon such an investigation. I have no doubt that the Bureau of Mines can expend the money, but at the end the plant will be junked and sold for a mere pittance, without any resulting gain to the industrial and commercial activity of the country.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I used to be one of those men who saw ghosts every time anything was presented to me that I did not know anything about. As a matter of fact, there is no Government ownership in this matter. By any far-fetched imagination there could not be; but, in anticipation of some such objection that might be offered by those who do not know anything about it, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] offered an amendment, which the committee accepted, which is section No. 2, that absolutely precludes any possibility of the Government going into business. This bill is simple in its terms. The wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. It is simply a bill to establish a plant that will demonstrate from a commercial standpoint the feasibility of developing and utilizing this great natural resource of the United States. There is not a bit of Government ownership in it. If we wanted to bring in a Government-ownership bill we would bring in a bill that would authorize the establishment of briquetting plants and other activities on the public domain, because there are millions of tons of this lignite in the public lands; but the committee which reported this is composed of men who are opposed to Government activities of this kind, except where it is absolutely necessary to conserve or develop our natural resources and build up the industrial and economic strength of the Nation, and for that reason we come in here and ask for a miserable pittance of $100,000 to undertake to develop one of the great natural resources of the United States, so as to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the commercial interests of the country that it would be a feasible proposition for them to come in and do like the commercial interests of other countries have done, namely, utilize the great product that is worth so much to our country.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I regret I can not yield; I have only four minutes. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] undertakes to say and did say boldly that this is a selfish proposition by a few Members to get a few thousand dollars spent in Arkansas, Texas, and Dakota. If the gentleman had known anything about the bill, he would have known that there is not a ton of lignite in my district; he would have known that not a dollar of this will be expended in my district nor in the district of any member of the committee; and he would have known where it is to be expended. If the gentleman had information about the matter, he would know that I have large coal fields in my district, and that if I were as selfish and as narrow in voting on legislation of this kind as the gentleman indicates that he is, I would oppose this, because the selfish interests of my district might be against the development of this great natural resource. Develop the lignite of Texas and they will not use as much coal from my district. Develop the lignites of North Dakota and of the West and they will not use so much coal from the gentlemen's districts, members of the committee, as they might otherwise use; but the members of this committee had no idea of selfishness but were moved solely by a desire to develop this great resource and thereby increase the economic strength of the Nation. The members of the committee found this great natural product in this country, one-third of the coal, and found that not only would its development add to the fuel and power of the country but that there is a possibility of breaking the monopoly of Germany in dyestuffs by developing and utilizing the oil that is found in these deposits. One hundred thousand dollars?

Oh, yes; "in these piping times of peace," as the gentleman says, we ought not to expend money for such purposes. Yet the gentleman has time and again voted for bills that expended millions on Government activities not worth one-half as much to the economic strength of the Nation, and he will do so again. You spend millions to build railroads in Alaska and millions to take care of private contractors, millions for irrigation, millions for public buildings, millions in increasing salaries, millions for useless positions, but, forsooth, when a committee comes in here with no selfish interests to serve, with none of them having a selfish interest in that the money is to be expended in their districts, and asks you to spend $100,000 to develop and utilize one-third of the coal deposits of the United States by putting the use of lignite on a paying commercial basis, like it is in other countries, the gentleman, with an assumed air of superiority, and as the self-appointed mentor of the House, raises the bugaboo of Government ownership. Such a contention is absurd, and readily appears so by even a cursory reading of the bill.

I have no interest in the bill other than the interest all have who have vision and intelligence sufficient to see the wisdom of developing the natural resources of the country. Of course, those who are lacking in constructive thought, and who limit their activities to objecting to everything not proposed by themselves, or does not give a direct benefit to their districts, can be expected to oppose measures of this kind. The committee believed this expenditure wise and that it would bring a great return to the country, and directed me to report it, which I have done. I repeat, I have no special interest in the bill, nor has my district, but I support it because I believe it is a wise piece of constructive legislation that will promote the public welfare. It will, I think, ultimately mean a saving of $15,000,000 annually to the State of Texas alone, and many more millions to the other Western States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas to suspend the rules and pass the bill as read with the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and on a division, at the suggestion of the Chair, there were—ayes 38, noes 20.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, on this I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 182, nays 85, answered "present" 4, not voting 160, as follows:

Mr. VAN DYKE with Mr. WILSON of Illinois.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be recorded present. I have a pair with my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. PADGETT. If I were allowed to vote, I should vote "no."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SAUNDERS. I voted "aye." I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. WALSH was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present, the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the tribute of ex-President Taft to the late Col. Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that has already been done to-day. The present occupant of the chair was not here then, but the clerks at the desk advise him that that order has been granted. This is suspension day, and the Speaker directed after the last motion that the Unanimous Consent Calendar be called.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The rule provides that immediately after the reading of the Journal on days when it is in order to suspend the rules the Speaker is directed to have the Unanimous Consent Calendar called. Business having intervened since the reading of the Journal, is it now in order to call the Unanimous Consent Calendar? Does it require unanimous consent to consider that calendar? I direct the present occupant of the chair to the rule:

On days when it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules the Speaker shall, immediately after the approval of the Journal, direct the Clerk to call the bills which have been for three days upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall immediately be stricken from such calendar; but such bill may be restored to the calendar at the instance of the Member, and if again objected to it shall be immediately stricken from such calendar and shall not thereafter be placed thereon: Provided, That the same bill shall not be called twice on the same legislative day.

It has been the policy, as the present occupant of the chair well knows, that the Unanimous Consent Calendar has been first called, and then the Speaker would recognize certain Members to move to suspend the rules. The rule specifically provides that immediately after the reading of the Journal it shall be in order and the Speaker is directed to have the Unanimous Consent Calendar called. Of course he has authority to suspend the rules and recognize Members for that purpose. Now, having done so, is it not too late to call the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is suspension day. Under the rules the first and third Mondays of each month are suspension days, when it is in order to move a suspension of the rules, and by the unanimous-consent agreement it is Monday, as far as the order of business is concerned. A motion to suspend the rules is in order at any time on those two Mondays of the month—at any time a motion to suspend the rules is in order. Now, the rule provides that on suspension days the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be called. It says:

Shall, immediately after the approval of the Journal, direct the Clerk to call the bills, etc.

No one will contend that that would prevent the Speaker recognizing some one to ask unanimous consent, as was done this morning, nor is it within the power of the Speaker to abrogate the rule by recognizing some one after the reading of the Journal to ask unanimous consent to do something else, and then say that because he has recognized some one to ask unanimous consent he can not physically direct the Clerk to call the Unanimous Consent Calendar after the reading of the Journal because he has done something else. The Speaker can not suspend a rule of the House in that way. It is the duty of the Speaker to have the Unanimous Consent Calendar called to-day under the rule. It is the privilege of the Speaker to recognize some one to ask unanimous consent to do something, and it is within the power of the Speaker to recognize any Member of the House to-day to move to suspend the rules, but meanwhile, when those things are out of the way, then the Unanimous Consent Calendar automatically is called for under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). Answering the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], the Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] correctly answered the inquiry. The Chair was going to answer the gentleman's inquiry before the gentleman from Illinois indicated his desire to express his views to the effect that this being the first Monday it was in order to call the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and the fact that there had been some motions to suspend the rules entertained previously in no wise vitiated the right that the Unanimous Consent Calendar should be called if the House should remain in session. The Clerk will report the first bill.

RESTORATION TO ENTRY OF 80-ROD STRIP RESERVATIONS IN ALASKA.

The first bill in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12210) to amend the act of May 14, 1898, as amended by the act of March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to extend the homestead laws and to regulate the sale and entry of public lands along the shore of navigable waters in Alaska."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman who reported this bill has to-day been ceremoniously deprived of his seat. I do not know whether the present Delegate from Alaska is acquainted with the present measure and I ask unanimous consent that the bill——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill is so plainly a proper measure and is so much needed by a few people that it ought not to be delayed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the last line of the bill there is a reservation that these reserved spaces shall not apply so far as harborage uses are concerned. I would like to inquire if that should not also include wharfage as well as harborage?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do you want to pass it without prejudice?

Mr. MANN. It ought to pass the House. The legislation ought to be enacted. Under the law relating to Alaska when a man has taken a homestead claim there must be 80 rods intervening between two homesteads, which is entirely unnecessary, and makes them a long way apart. Then they are restricted as to the area in width, and so forth, when the fact is that these homesteaders who take homesteads for agricultural purposes have to run along a stream to a very large extent. They want length and not width. Now, strange to say, contrary to the belief which I have entertained for many years, they are really developing some agriculture up there. I have learned recently by some reports and from talks, partly with Mr. SULZER, that they are supplying most of the small agricultural products up there by raising them at home. And this bill will permit these people to obtain homesteads which otherwise will be absolutely impossible and impracticable owing to the nature and location of the land up there suitable for the purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. The only doubt I had in my mind was as to whether it was feasible to grant to any homesteader more than 160 rods along any navigable stream.

Mr. MANN. But that is the very thing. Now, we reserved rights up there so as to reserve the navigation. But here comes a man wanting to homestead along a stream. He can only get now 160 rods. He can not go very far away from the stream—a narrow valley. He can utilize that ground in raising products. He can not afford to devote his entire time in raising products on a strip 160 rods long and which is only a few rods wide. There is no reason why he should not be permitted to get sufficient arable land in length to make him a homestead and then let somebody else get the land that is next to him. In other words, it was a desire on the part of Congress in the first place, and it was a proper desire, to prevent the monopolization of the lands along all navigable streams. In the main, that has been done, practically, and the Government has selected nearly everything they wanted up there, especially along the shore lines. We did not desire, and the gentleman will remember there were a number of contests in the House, to make it possible for some great monopoly to take the homesteads along the shore line and acquire the harborage rights on the harbors of Alaska. I think that is fully protected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12210) to amend the act of May 14, 1898, as amended by the act of March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to extend the homestead laws and to regulate the sale and entry of public lands along the shore of navigable waters in Alaska."

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stats. L., p. 409), extending the homestead laws to Alaska, and of the act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stats. L., p. 1028), amendatory thereof, in so far as they reserve from sale and entry a space of at least 80 rods in width between tracts sold or entered under the provisions thereof along the shore of any navigable water, and to provide that no entry shall be allowed extending more than 160 rods along the shore of any navigable water, shall not apply to lands classified and listed by the Secretary of Agriculture for entry under the act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 233), and that the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, restore to entry and disposition such reserved spaces as he shall determine are not necessary for harborage uses and purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANT OF LANDS TO THE CITY OF SAN DIEGO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10587) granting to the city of San Diego certain lands in the Cleveland National Forest and the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation for dam and reservoir purposes for the conservation of water, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, I understand, is not wanted to be considered now and ought to go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. RAKER. It will not take but a moment.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; it will.

Mr. RAKER. We do not want to put it at the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6421) to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs or who have been totally disabled in the military or naval service of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the bill be considered, Mr. Speaker, on the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6421) to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs or have been totally disabled in the same in the military or naval service of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act all persons on the pension roll, and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who, while in the military or naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or have been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $65 per month; and that all persons who in like manner shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or have been totally disabled in the same, or where there has been an excision or resection of any part of the bones of the arm or leg, or of the elbow or knee joints, or where there is an ankylosis of either of said joints, shall receive a pension at the rate of $70 per month; and that all persons who in like manner shall have lost an arm at the shoulder, or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such a condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, or have been totally disabled in the same, or where there has been an excision or resection of any part of the humerus or femur or of the shoulder or hip joint, or where there is ankylosis of either of said joints shall receive a pension at the rate of $75 per month; and that all persons who in like manner shall have lost one hand and one foot, or have been totally disabled in the same, or where there has been an excision or resection of any part of the arm or leg, or where there is an ankylosis of any of the joints of said arm or leg, shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month; and that all persons who in like manner shall have lost both hands or both feet, or have been totally disabled in the same, or where there has been an excision or resection of any part of the bones or joints of either of said arms or legs, or where there is an ankylosis of any of the joints of said arms or legs, shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month; and that all persons who in like manner shall have lost both arms and both legs, or have been totally disabled in the same, or where there has been an excision or resection of any part of the bones or of the joints of either of said arms or legs, shall receive a pension at the rate of $150 per month: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on that bill. I want to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INCREASING PENSIONS OF ARMY NURSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7738) to increase the rate of pension allowed to Army nurses.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under a reservation of an objection, I ask that this bill be read for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the rate of pension allowed to Army nurses of the Civil War, whose names have been or shall hereafter be properly placed upon the pension roll under the provisions of existing laws, and otherwise entitled to receive a less rate than herein provided, shall be $25 per month.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be construed to repeal or modify the provisions of section 4720, Revised Statutes, United States, as to rates of pension fixed by special act of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of the gentleman who introduced the bill and reported it as to the number of nurses that this bill will apply to.

Mr. LANGLEY. My information, obtained from the Commissioner of Pensions or the Pension Office, is that there are now only about 145 Army nurses to whom this increase would apply. There were when this bill was introduced something over 200. Nearly all of these Army nurses have battle-field records. A majority of them, I am informed, are in indigent circumstances, and I really think that it was an oversight that they were not included in the Ashbrook bill and the Smoot bill, increasing the pensions of widows. Everybody, I think, will agree that these Army nurses with this record should have been included.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. I will.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman advise the House what these Army nurses now get?

Mr. LANGLEY. They get $12 now. This bill is to increase their pension to $25 per month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the Speaker recognize me at this moment to make a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that he is now temporarily occupying the chair, and, carrying out the instructions of the Speaker, he could not entertain a motion now by anybody to suspend the rules. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LANDS OF THE SOUTHERN OREGON CO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8625) to accept from the Southern Oregon Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, a reconveyance of the lands granted to the State of Oregon by the act approved March 3, 1869, entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos Bay to Roseburg, in said State," commonly known as the Coos Bay Wagon Road grant, to provide for the disposition of said lands, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the execution and delivery by the Southern Oregon Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, of a deed satisfactory to the Attorney General of the United States, reconveying to the United States all the right, title, and interests of the said Southern Oregon Co. in and to the lands situated in the counties of Coos and Douglas, in the State of Oregon, and embraced within the limits of the grant made by the United States to the State of Oregon by the act of March 3, 1869, entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos Bay to Roseburg, in said State," commonly known as the Coos Bay Wagon Road grant, and now involved in litigation pending in the Supreme Court of the United States under the style and title "The Southern Oregon Co. v. The United States," the said lands shall again become a part of the public domain, and the United States shall pay to the Southern Oregon Co. the sum of $232,463.07. The execution and delivery of the aforesaid deed within 30 days from and after the approval of this act shall constitute the acceptance of this act by the said Southern Oregon Co.; and upon the approval of such deed by the Attorney General of the United States the aforesaid suit shall be dismissed and all matters of difference, controversy, and litigation between the United States and the said Southern Oregon Co. arising out of said land grant shall be deemed fully settled, adjusted, and terminated.

SEC. 2. That the taxes accrued and unpaid on the said lands on the date of the delivery of the deed provided for in the preceding section shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States upon the order of the Secretary of the Interior as soon as may be after this act becomes effective, and a sum sufficient to make such payment and also to provide for the payment of the said sum of $232,463.07, as provided for in section 1 of this act, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That the said lands shall be classified and disposed of in the manner provided by the act of June 9, 1916 (39 Stat. L., 218), for the classification and disposition of the Oregon and California railroad grant lands: Provided, That such persons who, being citizens of the United States, have continuously leased from the said Southern Oregon Co. for a period of not less than 10 years any of said lands classified as agricultural, not exceeding 160 acres to each person, shall be allowed a preference right of six months in which to purchase such lands from the United States by paying therefor the sum of $2.50 per acre: Provided further, That where any of such leased lands have been resided upon, to the same extent and in the same manner as is required under the homestead laws, since the 1st day of December, 1913, by any person duly qualified to enter such lands claiming adversely to such lessee, and who has improved the land and devoted some portion thereof to agricultural use, and who shall have maintained his residence to the date of his application, the claim of such settler and resident shall be superior to that of the lessee, and he shall be allowed the preference right of entry afforded actual settlers by section 5 of the act of June 9, 1916, aforesaid.

SEC. 4. That the title to all money arising out of said lands and now on deposit to await the final outcome of said suit now pending in the Supreme Court, as aforesaid, is hereby vested in the United States, and the United States is subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the obligee or obligees, and especially of Harry E. Laughlin as commissioner, under any contract for the purchase of timber on said lands.

SEC. 5. That all moneys received from or on account of said lands and timber and the timber thereon under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a separate fund to be designated "The Coos Bay Wagon Road grant fund," which fund shall be disposed of in the following manner: A separate account shall be kept in the General Land Office of the sales of said lands and timber within each of the two counties of Coos and Douglas, and after the proceeds from such sales amount to a sum equal to that applied to pay the accrued taxes in that county and a sum equal to $2.50 per acre for each acre of such land therein title to which is revested in the United States pursuant to the provisions of this act, 25 per cent of all other moneys received from said lands shall be paid to the State treasurer of the State of Oregon, to be and become a part of the irreducible school fund of the State; 25 per cent shall be paid to the treasurer of the county in which the lands sold are situated for common schools, roads, highways, bridges, and port districts, to be apportioned by the county courts for the several purposes above mentioned; 40 per cent shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the fund created by the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act; and the remainder shall become a part of the general fund in the Treasury of the United States. The payments herein authorized shall be made by the Treasurer of the United States upon the order of the Secretary of the Interior, as the fund accumulates in the Treasury: Provided, That none of the payments to the State and counties and to the reclamation fund provided for in this section shall be made until the Treasury has been reimbursed in the amount paid to the Southern Oregon Co. and also for all taxes paid pursuant to the provisions of section 2 of this act.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect; and any person, applicant, purchaser, entryman, or witness who shall swear falsely in any affidavit or proceeding required hereunder or under the regulations issued by the Secretary of the Interior shall be guilty of perjury and liable to the penalties prescribed therefor.

SEC. 7. That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Interior, in cooperation with the Secretary of Agriculture, or otherwise, to complete the classification of the lands as herein provided, which amount shall be immediately available and shall remain available until such classification shall have been completed.

SEC. 8. That this act shall become effective upon its acceptance by the Southern Oregon Co., in the manner provided by the first section hereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. If this bill is deferred in its passage until February or March, an additional amount of taxes will accrue to the extent of $40,000 or $60,000. This matter has been in the courts for some time. The Attorney General's Office has effected a compromise with the wagon-road company, by which the wagon-road company offers to settle the litigation, receiving just exactly what the courts have held that the wagon-road company is entitled to, and no more. If this bill is further delayed until the next tax-paying time comes around, something like $40,000 or $60,000 more of taxes will have to be paid in March, and it is to the interest of the Government that this litigation be settled at once. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will not insist on his objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may the bill be again reported?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will again be read.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. I wish to further state, Mr. Speaker, that this is really a bill retaking something like 93,000 acres of land and vesting in the United States Government the title of a wagon-road grant. The bill was drafted by the Attorney General's office and introduced by myself, and the committee modified the bill and changed the allowance to the State from 50 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The copy of the bill that I have before me does not show that it has been reported from the committee.

Mr. SINNOTT. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. The gentleman must have the wrong copy.

Mr. MANN. It was reported on June 24, 1918, by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Just a moment, if you please. Is there a unanimous report?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. There is a unanimous report.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, just prior to the close of the last session I asked unanimous consent that this bill be passed over so that further information could be obtained, and later on my former colleague, Senator LENROOT, called upon me and stated that he had given very full consideration to this measure and that it was in line with the bill that had been passed concerning the Oregon and California railroad land grants.

Mr. SINNOTT. Except the allowance to the State is cut in two.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The bill ought to be on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the gentleman from Tennessee I might say that I was a member of the subcommittee, consisting of Mr. TILLMAN as chairman and somebody else, and that we reported this bill unanimously to the whole committee. The report was unanimous from the Committee on the Public Lands in favor of this bill.

It occurred to the committee from the evidence that the matter was urgent, and that the Government stood to gain in the transaction; that 93,000 acres of good timber land—most of it good timber land—was granted back to the Government, and altogether the United States was to be the gainer in the passage of the bill. I think, therefore, that there should not be any objection made.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the bill is on the Union Calendar. While my friend says it was on the House Calendar, it is now on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I withdraw the objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "terminated" add the following: "Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the United States from instituting and maintaining such suits or actions as may be necessary to recover the value of timber or other material heretofore cut or removed from any of said lands without the consent of the Southern Oregon Co."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 6, after the word "accrued" strike out the word "and," and after the word "unpaid" insert the words "and now delinquent."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to a clerical mistake. In line 6 the insertion of the word "now" in the amendment is improper, because it obscures the sense and is really not good grammar. On page 3, line 6, the word "now" should be stricken out of the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman offers to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "now"?

Mr. SINNOTT. By striking out the word "now."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Attorney General, in his letter to the chairman of the committee, suggested that it should be made clear whether the Government is to pay only the principal of the taxes or both the principal and the penalties and interest. As I read this amendment, the Government will be obligated to pay the penalties and the interest.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the way they did upon the Oregon-California railroad grant. The taxes, including penalties and interest, are a valid lien, and I think they should be paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, we are helping the county by paying this large sum, running into $400,000.

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, at the same time you are removing the property from the tax roll.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the amount of the penalties and interest accumulated on the taxes now due on this property?

Mr. SINNOTT. It is stated in the report of the Attorney General, on page 5, that the taxes in Coos County, without penalty and interest, for the years 1909 to 1916 amount to $233,636.45, while with the penalty and interest these taxes amount to $366,693.95. The net tax claimed by Douglas County, where the smaller portion of the grant is situated, amounts to $32,463.55, while the penalty and interest in this county are $9,699.11, making a total for Douglas County of $42,162.66.

Mr. STAFFORD. Making a total altogether of $408,846.61?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And making a grand total of $641,309.68?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. That will require a total payment, of the taxes and the amount to the wagon-road company, aggregating $641,309.68, while the minimum valuation put upon the revested land is $2,000,000, and the estimates run from $2,000,000 up to $4,000,000. The Government will get 75 per cent of that difference. The taxes are ultimately going to be paid out of the sale of the land and timber.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I read the report, the $641,309.68 is the total amount for taxes, penalties, and interest.

Mr. SINNOTT. The total cost to the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. For taxes alone?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; for taxes and the payment of $2.50 an acre to the wagon-road company.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the way I read that paragraph. Let us read it again:

It will thus be seen that if Congress assumes the obligation of paying all the accrued taxes, with penalty and interest, the total cost to the Government will amount to $641,309.68.

Mr. SINNOTT. If you add together the $232,463.07 and the $408,846.61, it amounts to $641,309.68.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is correct and I am in error.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the total payment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is there any question in the gentleman's mind that the term "taxes unpaid and delinquent" includes penalties and interest?

Mr. SINNOTT. There is some question.

Mr. MANN. I should think so.

Mr. SINNOTT. And in the Oregon land-grant case the Attorney's General's office finally resolved it in favor of paying the penalties and the interest, and I tried to impress upon the committee the importance of clearing that up, but the committee thought otherwise. I wanted to insert the phrase "including penalties and interest," although I think that the Attorney General's office will probably advise the payment of the penalties and the interest. I think, as the gentleman from Illinois does, that the matter should be cleared up now, but I do not feel at liberty to offer the amendment.

Mr. MANN. It is also important in connection with section 5, where it provides for the repayment, that—after the proceeds from such sales amount to a sum equal to that applied to pay the accrued taxes in that county and a sum equal to $2.50 per acre for each acre of such land therein title to which is revested in the United States pursuant to the provisions of this act—certain disposition shall be made of the money. I take it, however, that that is sure to mean whatever taxes are paid.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Whether it includes penalties and interest or not?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think the bill should be amended to insert the phrase "including penalties and interest," but I do not feel at liberty to offer the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that before it becomes a law it will be so amended.

Mr. GARD. I ask the gentleman to yield for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. Will the chairman of the committee advise me whether or not it was the intention of the committee to include this matter of penalties and interest?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is my recollection, that it was.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think the committee thought that language included it, but I wanted to make it clear.

Mr. GARD. Another member of the committee advises me that such is not the fact.

Mr. MANN. Are not the penalties and interest a lien on the land, and do they not have to be paid?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Government has no right to assume to seize this land without paying the taxes that are due upon it, has it? I do not know.

Mr. GARD. I do not know. The matter is one of arrangement between the Government and this corporation as to what shall be paid by the Government.

Mr. MANN. There is a contest between the parties, but the title is in the corporation.

Mr. GARD. The title is in the corporation.

Mr. MANN. And the taxes are assessed against the land.

Mr. GARD. In the transfer of the title there may be a provision as to the amount of taxes to be paid.

Mr. MANN. Here is a case where the taxes are assessed by a municipality. The Government makes an arrangement in the contest by which the Government takes the title back from the private corporation. Meanwhile the taxes have accrued. I doubt very much whether the Government, in compromising with that party, can oust the municipality or county of its right of taxation against this land. Very likely the money has been spent, and it may be bills issued to be paid out of the receipts when collected on this property. I do not know how that is.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment to clear that matter up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee amendments will be first disposed of and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman to offer an amendment. The Clerk will first report the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 6, strike out the word "now," at the end of the line.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 24, after the word "years," insert "or who under lease from said company have cultivated and placed valuable improvements upon."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman if this is intended to include persons who may have put on inexpensive improvements and give them a preferential right to the property at $2.50 an acre?

Mr. SINNOTT. That committee amendment was put in at the suggestion of the Attorney General's office. The gentleman who went out there to investigate the land and the grant reports upon page 16 what he found upon the ground. A great many settlers went upon this land thinking they could compel the Wagon Road Co. to execute a deed to them, for the reason that the granting act contained the language that the grant should be "upon condition that the lands shall be sold to any person only in quantities not greater than a one-quarter section and for a price not exceeding $2.50 an acre."

Parties went on the land, cultivated it, and plowed and improved it. The court held that no settler could compel the Wagon Road Co. to make a grant to him. So the settlers, in order to protect their rights, entered into leases and agreements with the Wagon Road Co. that they should occupy the land, and in some cases also took options of sale. That committee amendment is for the purpose of taking care of these settlers and those who placed improvements thereupon.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill as reported takes care of those who have continuously leased from the Wagon Road Co. for not less than 10 years. This will provide for subsequent squatters who happen to go on the land and make improvements.

Mr. SINNOTT. Who leased from the Wagon Road Co. and have cultivated the land and placed improvements thereon. In addition to paying $2.50 an acre these parties mentioned in the committee amendment would have to pay the taxes accrued against the land. They have that additional burden added to that of the ordinary purchaser.

Mr. MANN. Do they have to pay for the timber?

Mr. SINNOTT. They could not get the timber. If the timber runs over a million two hundred thousand to 160 acres, the land will be classified the same as it is under the Oregon and California land grants.

Mr. MANN. Is there any necessity of having both these provisions in the bill—the one in the bill and now the committee amendment. Are there any of these lessees who have continually leased the land for 10 years who have not made any valuable improvement upon it?

Mr. SINNOTT. That was the information of the Attorney General's office.

Mr. MANN. The information of the Attorney General's office was that people who had leased the land for 10 years continuously and made valuable improvements ought to have priority of right, but are there any of those who have leased continuously for 10 years and made no improvements on the land? I ask out of curiosity.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can not answer it from very specific knowledge, but I understand from information that there are persons who leased under 10-year provisions and who have built houses, barns, fenced the land, and cultivated and made their homes there and who have been paying taxes.

Mr. MANN. There is no occasion for the original provision remaining in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me ask the gentleman if this is intended to take care of those who are mentioned on page 16—mere squatters on the land, who entered into it without any arrangement with the Wagon Road Co.?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; the amendment provides that they must have a lease from the Wagon Road Co.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the lease may be made at any time, and it was the original intention to grant this right to those who had a lease for 10 years.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Attorney General's office points out that there are a few persons who entered on the land without any contractual relations with the Wagon Road Co. and lived there a little while and made some scattering improvements.

Mr. SINNOTT. They are not embraced in this provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; they are if they subsequently got a lease.

Mr. SINNOTT. They must have had a lease and they must have had it for the last five or six years.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they could get a lease after this bill passes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The court has enjoined the Wagon Road Co. from making any disposition of the land. That injunction has been in force, I think, since 1914 or 1915.

Mr. MANN. Does that prevent the making of a lease of the ground?

Mr. SINNOTT. Any disposition at all until Congress shall have had an opportunity to pass on it.

Mr. MANN. Are they forbidden to make a lease of the ground?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. SINNOTT. I am.

Mr. MANN. Unless they violate the injunction, there would be no leases granted after this bill passes.

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. HAWLEY. The lease would be invalid if granted?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that the lease would be invalid. They might send the man to jail for contempt of court.

Mr. HAWLEY. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, my information is that the persons to be taken care of in the amendment of the committee have built good improvements on the land, intending to make it their home; they have built fences and barns and houses and other improvements.

Mr. STAFFORD. They went there without any arrangement with the Wagon Road Co.

Mr. HAWLEY. If any such people are included in this amendment, I do not know of them. I am speaking of those who have not resided on the land for 10 years, but who have resided there for 4 or 5 years and have made good improvements.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are pure squatters, and this is to take care of those people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the other committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 4, after the word "acre," insert the words "and reimbursing the United States for the taxes paid on such land: Provided further."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 15, 16, and 17, after the word "paid," in line 15, strike out the words "to the State treasurer of the State of Oregon, to be and become a part of the irreducible school fund of the State, 25 per cent shall be paid."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 21, 22, 23, and 24, after the word "mentioned," in line 21, strike out the words "40 per cent shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the fund created by the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 6, after the word "the," strike out the words "State and," and after the word "counties," in line 6, strike out the words "and to the reclamation fund."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 20, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$12,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALARY OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY—CONNECTICUT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4246) to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Connecticut.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Connecticut shall be at the rate of $5,000 a year.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,500."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that this bill is one that has been pending in different shapes here for a number of years. I think the first report was to increase the salary from $2,500 for the district attorney to $3,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman may possibly be referring to the bill to increase the salary in Rhode Island.

Mr. MANN. Well, it may have been Rhode Island. I do not differentiate between the two—they are both alike; both equally meritorious. Next it was reported to increase the salary from $2,500 to $4,000. Now I see the bill is reported to increase the salary from $2,500 to $4,500. Does not the gentleman from Connecticut believe it would be a good idea for some one to object so the next Congress may put it to $5,000; probably the district attorney for so important a district ought to get $5,000 a year.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that in the Sixty-third Congress a bill passed the Senate fixing the salary at $4,000, and the committee which had the matter in charge in the House decided not to deal with questions of this character because it was following the outbreak of the European war, when no such appropriation bills were being considered.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we have had a bill reported from that committee every Congress, I think, for a number of Congresses for this very Rhode Island, increasing the salary from $2,500 to some amount, as I have stated before.

Mr. LONERGAN. Well, the Sixty-third Congress and this Congress are the only two I know of that considered a bill for Connecticut, and the committee has acted favorably on the pending bill. I will say to the gentleman that the district attorney in Connecticut is obliged to devote all of his time to the performance of the duties of his office. The Attorney General approves of an increase.

The United States district judge wrote a letter stating that the attorney was fully occupied in the performance of his duties and the population of the State of Connecticut has increased between 600,000 and 700,000 since the salary was fixed at $2,500 something like 50 years ago. We have the largest alien population industrially in the United States.

Mr. MANN. What has that got to do with the district attorney?

Mr. LONERGAN. I was just leading up to it. The war work in the industries has been very great, and we did not have in the State of Connecticut any cases of property destruction or loss of life, because under the jurisdiction of the United States district attorney's office there was a large number of men employed doing detective work, investigation work, and reporting back to the United States district attorney. The office has been efficiently conducted, and I think if the gentleman from Illinois will make inquiry at the office of the Attorney General he will find that they have had as much of the watching of property as any office in the United States of like character.

Mr. MANN. I have not said anything against the district attorney. I doubt very much whether the district attorney has very much to do with watching over the natives or alien population during the war, and, if so, that is past in the main. There may be other reasons, but I rose mainly to suggest to my distinguished friend from Connecticut that this bill is for one district of the United States. It has to go through, if it passes here, and pass the scrutiny of another body of very distinguished people. I trust it will not be weighted down when it comes back with amendments fixing the salary in a lot of the other districts, because if it does it may pass here; I do not know.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LONERGAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ELDORADO, KANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12881) to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill just reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H R. 12881) to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the acquisition, by purchase or otherwise, of a site and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other Government offices at Eldorado, Kans., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to increase the limit of cost for said building from $60,000 to $95,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. AYRES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNLAWFUL ORGANIZATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4471) to declare unlawful associations purposing by physical force, violence, or injury to bring about any governmental, social, industrial, or economic change in the United States, and prescribing punishment for persons engaged in the activities of such associations, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR DISTRICT OF ARIZONA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 714) providing for an additional judge for the district of Arizona.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Indiana object, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

TIMBER PRIVILEGES TO CERTAIN CITIZENS IN OREGON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12579) to grant citizens of Malheur County, Oreg., the right to cut timber in the State of Idaho for agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, and to remove such timber to Malheur County, Oreg.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to grant permits, under the provisions of the eighth section of the act of March 3, 1891, to citizens of Malheur County, Oreg., to cut timber in the State of Idaho for agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, and to remove the timber so cut to Malheur County, State of Oregon."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "ninety-one," insert the following: "chapter 561, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1891, chapter 559, page 1093, volume 26, United States Statutes at Large."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman who has introduced the bill to inform the House of the necessity for a bill which grants the cutting of timber in one State to be carried to another State without any apparent limitation as to its use.

Mr. SINNOTT. The present law and regulations permit the cutting of timber not to exceed the value of $50 in any one year, to be used for the purposes set forth in the act, but that law precludes the use of that timber so cut in any other State than the State in which it is cut, except that the act has been twice amended permitting timber to be taken from Wyoming to Idaho and from Montana to Wyoming. Now, in the section of Oregon seeking relief by this bill there is no timber; there is particularly no timber in the Jordan Valley, on the Oregon side. The Jordan Valley is half in Oregon, in Malheur County, and half in Idaho. Over on the Idaho side there is considerable juniper timber, which may be cut and used for fence posts and for other domestic purposes. Over on the Oregon side they have recently voted a bond issue of some $900,000 to irrigate lands under a Carey Act project, and unless they can get this timber over on the Idaho side they are going to be very much handicapped and embarrassed in the development of this section of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is perfectly natural that the gentleman who drafted the bill should draft it in the form that he did, but it makes a rather, I was going to say, ludicrous condition of the statutes, because this is a provision to add to the eighth section of a certain law an amendment which says the provision of the eighth section, and so forth, shall not apply. That is the section to which this amendment is added, so that when this law shall be compiled it will read as section so-and-so, and at the end of that section it will refer to itself in a very formal manner, by referring to itself as the eighth section of a certain statute of the United States as amended. It would have been simpler, I would suggest to the gentleman, to amend the section by adding the new language to the provision of this section, and so forth, because this becomes a part of section 8.

Mr. SINNOTT. I probably followed the precedents too slavishly. I merely copied the other old amendments.

Mr. MANN. I am not endeavoring to criticize the gentleman at all. What was done was very natural, but it does make it read rather awkwardly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman advise the House why he made the reference to the law he seeks to amend so specific, by not only citing it by chapter but also by the date on which it was passed? It is not customary to be so specific, to mention the chapter and then add the date of the approval of the act.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will say to the gentleman that there were two acts passed about the same time, and the date was included so as to distinguish between the two.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but the two acts did not bear the same title. It says:

That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, chapter 561, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1891, chapter 559, page 1093, volume 26, United States Statutes at Large.

I do not think the gentleman could find anything else in the statute whereby he could describe the act which he intends to amend more specifically.

Mr. SINNOTT. There has always been a matter of uncertainty——

Mr. MANN. No; it has not been a matter of uncertainty. It is a fact that the Land Office and the Department of the Interior have recommended this sort of thing for years, and I have almost reached the conclusion that it is a good thing.

If there is one difficult thing to find it is something in the Statutes at Large where you refer to the date of the statute and the date of the approval, because the dear compilers of the Statutes at Large will not print on each page of the Statutes at Large the date of the approval of the act, but they simply put in the chapter, and if you know the date of the approval of the act you can look and find it. In the case of appropriation bills you have to look at the end or the beginning in order to find the date. Now, these people have recommended an amendment which permits anyone at a moment's notice to turn to the page of the statute where the matter is to be found, and to know exactly how to find it, and where to find it, and find it quickly.

Mr. STAFFORD. The reference to the page is surplusage.

Mr. MANN. It is all surplusage. I can find it by reference to the title.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it is not necessary to put it in.

Mr. MANN. I say it is not necessary to put any of it in, but I am getting around to the conclusion, that it is a good thing to put in the chapter and page, so as to find it quickly in the Statutes at Large. Our statutes of the United States are now so jumbled up that the famed "Philadelphia lawyer" can not find what he is hunting one time in two.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the passage of this bill or take up the time of the House more than a moment, but I want to congratulate the Committee on Public Lands on their energy and capacity for getting out their own bills. There are quite a number on this calendar from that committee, and they are making progress and passing bills. I hope they will soon have their bills all wound up, so that they can pay some attention to the bills of other Members who are not on the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that from the commencement of this session of Congress in December the chairman of that committee [Mr. FERRIS] has been unavoidably away on account of sickness.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I suppose he was overworked in the handling of a national campaign. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; both he and his wife have been quite ill with the "flu." Politics has nothing to do with his absence. But he will not be here next week. I have been acting as chairman of the Public Lands Committee thus far this session and I have tried to give every man who has a bill pending before the committee an opportunity to come before the committee, and we have heard everybody who has come. You have not appeared before the committee this session. We have had several meetings and hearings have been given to everyone who asked recognition, I think. We have endeavored to finish up as nearly as we can all the important business and not at all confine our actions to bills in which the membership of the committee are interested. In fact, we put in practically all this morning listening to Senators and Senate bills. There has been no thought whatever of selfishly reporting out only our own bills. But it is perfectly natural that the members of that committee from the public-land States should have more of those bills than other Members do. However, any Member who has a bill that ought to pass can very easily get a hearing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I congratulate the gentleman. I have had a bill pending there for a long time, and I have been promised several times that I shall have a hearing.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman ever asked for a hearing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I have asked for a hearing many times.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If I am acting chairman, as I probably will be, I assure the gentleman he will be accorded a hearing if he appears before the committee next Saturday morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have asked for a hearing many times, as the chairman of the committee and the secretary will testify.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman, for his satisfaction, that the committee ordered favorably reported four of the gentleman's bills this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am very glad to hear it; and on the strength of that statement I will withdraw my pro forma amendment. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR BRADY, OF IDAHO.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, January 26, be set aside for addresses on the life, character, and services of the late Senator BRADY, of Idaho.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that Sunday, January 26, be set aside for addresses on the life, character, and services of the late Senator BRADY, of Idaho.

There was no objection.

WATER SUPPLY FOR OLATHE, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5989) to grant certain lands to the town of Olathe, Colo., for the protection of its water supply.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, these seem to be public-land bills. I will ask the gentleman if he intends to have the House adjourn as soon as this bill passes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I was hoping that we could let it run through this whole page. Here are nine public-land bills, all of which are meritorious measures.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the House that the only way under the sun that the western Members of this House can ever get an opportunity to have these necessary bills passed is by their consideration on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need to spend any time in telling me that. I know that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. MANN. I did not take up the time of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I know the gentleman has not. He has been treating us very nicely.

Mr. MANN. It was the gentleman's side of the House that wasted time to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; we have not wasted any time.

Mr. MANN. Why, surely.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think either side has wasted any time.

Mr. MANN. First, you wasted time in two roll calls on a contested-election case. Then you wasted time on some other matters. The delay did not come from this side of the House. It does not lie in the mouth of any gentleman on that side of the House to lecture this side of the House about wasting time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have not been lecturing anybody.

Mr. MANN. Especially in view of what has taken place since the first Monday in December.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey to the town of Olathe, county of Montrose, and State of Colorado, the southeast quarter of section 24, township 48 north, range 12, and the south half of section 19, and the southwest quarter of section 20, both in township 48 north, range 11 west, of the New Mexico principal meridian, in said county and State, containing 640 acres, more or less, to have and to hold said lands for the purpose of the protection of the reservoirs and water-supply pipe lines and waterworks system of said town: Provided, That the said town of Olathe shall, within two years from the passage of this act, pay for said lands, or such portions thereof as may be necessary for said purposes, at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided further, That the grant hereby made is, and the patent issued thereunder shall be, subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired by any person or persons in or to the above-described premises, or any part thereof, and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States: And provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the lands so granted, and all necessary use of the lands for extracting the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "same" insert the following:
"And provided further, That title to the land shall revert to the United States should the same or any part thereof be sold or cease to be used for the purposes herein provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter discussing the telegraph and telephone systems and the wisdom of the union of the two and the Government ownership of the same. This letter is written by Mr. Theodore N. Vail, president of one of these companies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that Mr. Vail is now associated with the Government in the operation and direction of the telephone and telegraph systems of the country.

Mr. MOON. I do not know whether he is or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. If he is not, I shall be constrained to object. I understand that he occupies some official capacity with the Government.

Mr. MOON. He may. I do not know whether he does or does not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, until I can get the information——

Mr. STEENERSON. I have seen the statement in the newspapers that he is the official adviser of the Postmaster General on telegraphs and telephones.

Mr. STAFFORD. If he occupies some official capacity with the Government, I have no objection to the matter being inserted in the RECORD. Otherwise, I shall object.

Mr. MOON. I do not know, but I accept the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 35) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether this bill extends to others than qualified homestead entrymen?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think so. I have not the general law before me, but it is to allow agricultural entries on lands reserved for coal lands.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman to the designation that it applies to "actual settlers." That does not mean qualified entrymen. It would apply to any person who happened to locate upon Government land.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think there was any intentional point in that matter. It was to make the law extend to the Territory of Alaska. We have a law allowing agricultural entries on the surface of coal lands.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose to grant them the privilege of entering upon unsurveyed public lands?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think so. My recollection is that there are great quantities of land in Alaska not surveyed and perhaps will not be for 50 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do we authorize entries in the States on unsurveyed public lands?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, forest reserves; and survey it out by metes and bounds.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR RECLAMATION OF LANDS IN OREGON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13042) providing for the extension of time for the reclamation of certain lands in the State of Oregon under the Carey Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, within his discretion, to extend for a period of not exceeding 10 years the time of segregation in the Oregon Carey Act segregation list No. 13, comprising approximately 27,000 acres of land, same being situated in Deschutes County, Oreg., provided the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to grant to the State of Oregon a similar extension of 10 years for the reclamation of said lands in addition to the time allotted under existing rules, regulations, contracts, and laws.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, within his discretion, to continue to not beyond January 12, 1929, the segregation of the lands embraced in approved Oregon segregation list No. 13, under the Carey Act.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if it is customary to use in the law the expression "Carey Act"?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; it is referred to in those words in various statutes. This amendment came from the department and was recommended by the department.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Carey Act has a well-defined meaning to our minds, but has it a well-defined meaning in the courts?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think it has a well-defined meaning in the courts. Everyone understands it as well as they do the "reclamation law."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is referred to in the courts as the Carey Act.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was again read for amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO THE ESPIONAGE ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9094) to amend section 1 of Title VIII of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill, and it is too late to give it the consideration that it ought to have. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that it go over.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for me to move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think that anything is in order after the fact is ascertained that no quorum is present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. TAGUE, leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. BRAND, for five days, on account of illness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ZIHLMAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers, without leaving copies, in the case of John T. Wheeler, Company I, Seventeenth West Virginia Volunteers, Sixty-fifth Congress, no adverse report being made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 8, 1919.

The House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we stand before Thee with bowed heads and sorrowing hearts as a great leader, among the leaders of the Nation, is being laid to his final rest. Peace be to his ashes and rest to his soul.

A Nation is in tears. Many distinguished men, who loved and admired him for his sterling qualities, his energy, skill, and undaunted courage, will give their presence to the last rites that mortals can bestow upon the dead. Their tears will mingle with the tears of the bereaved wife and children.

Comfort them, we beseech Thee, with the promise handed down to us out of the ages.

> There is no death! What seems so is transition;
> This life of mortal breath
> Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
> Whose portal we call Death.

Thus comfort the Nation and the world and inspire the living with an earnest desire to follow his illustrious example; and Thine be the glory through Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BRAND, for 10 days, on account of illness; and

To Mr. MAYS, at the request of Mr. WELLING, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communications, which were read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 6, 1919.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I hereby resign my office as Representative in the Congress of the United States from the at-large district of Pennsylvania.

Very sincerely,

JOHN R. K. SCOTT.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., January 7, 1919.

SECRETARY TO HON. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

My resignation to take effect January 5, 1919.

JOHN R. K. SCOTT.

RECESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the distinguished ex-President of the United States, Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, whose funeral will presently take place, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 2 o'clock p. m. as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Theodore Roosevelt. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I request unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire on what subject the gentleman intends to address the House?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to present to the House through a letter received from a sailor boy what I consider a very grave hardship which is being suffered by many sailors whose applications for discharge have been already approved.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the gentleman taken it up with the Navy Department?

Mr. POU. If the gentleman will refrain from making that request I will yield him five minutes on the discussion on the rule I now present.

Mr. BLANTON. I will be glad to do so.

MARY C. CARPENTER.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 491 (H. Rept. No. 899).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Mary C. Carpenter, mother of John M. Carpenter, late an employee on the rolls of the House of Representatives, a sum equivalent to six months' salary, at the rate he was drawing at the time of his death, and an additional sum, not exceeding $250, to defray funeral expenses.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

RELIEF FOR INFORMAL CONTRACTS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I submit a privileged report (No. 902), which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 487.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 13274; that the amendment reported by the committee shall be read and considered in lieu of the original bill; that there shall be not exceeding three hours of general debate, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill, which debate shall be confined to said bill, at the end of which time the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, and at the conclusion of such reading the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, together with the amendments, if any, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the rule——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this bill was erroneuosly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which had no jurisdiction over it, and that the Committee on Rules had no jurisdiction to report upon it at this stage and it is improperly before the House, and I would like to be heard on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman. Let the Chair get exactly the point of order that is made by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the point I make is that this bill was improperly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which never acquired any jurisdiction of it, and that by the method of procedure employed as yet the Committee on Rules has acquired no jurisdiction of it and has no authority to present it here, and it can not be considered by the House as yet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, now, the Chair will state to the gentleman that the point of order on which he would like to hear from the gentleman from Kansas is as to the question of jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules. The other question can be determined later.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, that is the point to which I was expecting to address myself. Section 4 of Rule XXI provides that no bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be sent to any committee other than four or five named there. The Committee on Military Affairs is not one of those committees. It is specifically omitted.

For that reason the Military Affairs Committee never acquired any jurisdiction of this bill. That committee could not report it to the House. It could not go to the Committee on Rules and that committee could not do anything about it. The only connection it could have with it would be to send it back to the Speaker's table and request that it be referred to the proper committee, which would be the Committee on Claims, the chairman of which agrees with me in the position I am taking here. Upon that question I assume there is no discussion.

It has been stated heretofore that this point is too late a point on which to raise this point of order. As a matter of fact, this is the first time this bill has come before the House and the first time anybody has had an opportunity to call attention to the fact that it is not in order and is not brought up at the proper time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I prefer not to be interrupted; the gentleman will have ample opportunity to reply.

Mr. POU. All right.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, as to that point, that has been ruled on some time ago. I raised a similar point on the woman suffrage amendment, which was in a committee that was not entitled to jurisdiction, and the Chair held against me. The Chair evidently had not read 15 or 20 precedents the other way, to which my attention has now been directed. Hinds, section 4382, says:

The erroneous reference of a private bill to a committee not entitled to jurisdiction does not confer it, and the point of order is good when the bill comes up either in the House or in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman permit the Chair for a moment? The Chair is not now called upon to deal with the proper reference of House bill 13274. That which is before the House at this time is the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules, House resolution 487.

Mr. LITTLE. I am quite as familiar with that as the Chair is. I am reasonably well informed on it. That is the point. I say you had no business to bring it in here, and I am taking the first step on the stairs, and when I get to the top of the stairs I hope the Speaker will be with me; if not, very well, I will then have a decision on it. First, I have now established that the Committee on Military Affairs had no jurisdiction of it, and they are the people who brought it to you, and I have now established the fact that the point of order that they had no jurisdiction is in order at this time. Mr. Speaker Crisp ruled on that and said:

Mr. Joseph D. Sayers, of Texas, made the point of order that the bill was improperly referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and that under the rules that committee had no authority to report the bill, it being for the payment of a claim against the Government.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, holding in part as follows:

Therefore the Chair thinks that a private bill referred under clause 1 of Rule XXII to any other committee than one of those named in clause 4 of Rule XXI can not be considered or reported by such committee.

It does not make any difference what the Rules Committee would do with it. It can not be reported, under this ruling, by the Military Affairs Committee anyway, and they could not have taken it to them. But to continue:

And it seems to the Chair that the only time when the question can be raised is when the bill is called up for consideration, because these bills are reported just as they are introduced, through the box, and they do not come to the attention of the Chair at all until they are called up for consideration. The Chair never sees them or knows anything of them, because they are not presented as are reports or public bills in the open House, but they come in through the box.

The Speaker also stated that when a point of order shall be made that a private bill on the calendar had been reported by a committee not authorized to report the same, the Chair would, if the point be made before the consideration of the bill had been entered upon, direct that such bill be recommitted to the committee improperly reporting it for appropriate action under the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Can the gentleman give the citation of that?

Mr. LITTLE. This is section 4382 of Hinds' Precedents. I thought I stated that when I began reading.

On March 4, 1898, the House was in Committee of the Whole House considering the Private Calendar. They had passed from the House into the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Dalzell made the point of order that the bill was not properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on War Claims, which had reported it, and the Chair held that it was not and that if the point was raised in the Committee of the Whole the Chair would have to rule that it had no place there. If this Committee on Rules should secure this rule and we should go into the Committee of the Whole, I would still be at liberty to raise the point of order that the Committee of the Whole had no business to take this up, because nobody with any jurisdiction had gotten to it yet. And it is perfectly plain that I am in proper time with this point of order. I have established, as I think, the fact that the Committee on Military Affairs had no jurisdiction and that I can raise the point now or in the Committee of the Whole, where it will have to go, I presume. Furthermore, the Committee on Rules had no jurisdiction of it, the Committee on Military Affairs had no jurisdiction of it, and had no authority to take it to the Committee on Rules. It should have gone to the Committee on Claims in the first place. If that committee had presented it to the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Rules had reported this rule, there would be no objection to it.

There is another theory that has been advanced to the effect that this is not a private bill. That matter has also been disposed of by this House. If you will turn to section 4265 of Hinds' Precedents, it says:

Appropriations for payment of French spoliation claims being included in a private bill reported by the Committee on War Claims, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House ordered them stricken out as belonging to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Claims.

That point was raised by the very learned, and probably the most learned, parliamentarian of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It says:

After the bill had been read, Mr. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, made a point of order, saying:

"I wish to make a point of order on this bill, or so much of it as relates to the French spoliation claims, on the ground that the Committee on War Claims has no jurisdiction to report a bill of this sort, it being a private bill, subject to a point of order at this time."

The Chair held with him. The French spoliation claims were a class, just as the claims involved here are a class. If the bill taking up the French spoliation claims as a class was a private claims bill, so is a bill taking up these bills as a class, and the pertinency makes a parallel, as I think will be conceded by any fair-minded man. If so, that matter is disposed of. This is a private claim. Nor is that all. If you return to 4381, you will find that Hinds says:

A bill to provide a commission to settle claims against the Government does not fall within the rule requiring private claims to be referred only to certain specified committees.

On July 18, 1894, Mr. Joseph H. Outhwaite, of Ohio, presented for consideration the bill (H. R. 5939) to appoint a commission to report and determine upon certain damages done to citizens of Lauderdale County, Ala., by the building of the Muscle Shoals Canal.

Mr. Joseph D. Sayers, of Texas, made the point of order that the bill having been erroneously referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, that committee had no jurisdiction to consider and report it, and that it should be committed to the proper committee.

After debate the Speaker overruled the point, holding that inasmuch as the bill did not provide for the payment or adjudication of a claim against the Government, it did not come within the purview of clause 4 of Rule XXI, and that unanimous consent was not required to refer the same to the Committee on Military Affairs.

If this were a bill to establish a commission to report to the House upon these claims—which would be a very proper bill, and I would be glad to support it—then my point of order could not be raised, but this is a bill authorizing the War Department to adjudicate and pay these claims, and, clearly, after this ruling, by implication would be involved in the error I have suggested.

And, furthermore, that was a general bill, like this, covering a whole series of claims. Nobody objected to that, Mr. Speaker, or suggested then that it was not a private claim. That was conceded. It was just such a bill as this in purpose, to omnibus certain transactions and bring them together in one fell swoop. If such a bill is not a private-claim bill, and there is a precedent for that, why should anybody suggest this is not? They were perfectly competent parliamentarians there. If they did not consider it proper, they would have raised the point. I would be sorry to see anybody suggest it was not. John Jones can bring in a bill, and it is a private claim, and John Smith can do so. If they are put together, they say it is not a private-claim bill, and if that is not true of two how can it be of the 6,669 that we have here, as the record shows? It does not make any difference, Mr. Speaker, how many thousands of claims are placed together, they still remain private claims, and if you argue the principle and not the precedent, although the precedent is with me, you must concede that this is an omnibus bill and covers a series of private claims. That is all it is in principle.

Now, I wish to say a word about the principles upon which are based the rules which I have suggested, and the reason why. To overrule this point of order would be in effect a destruction of all rules and orderly methods of procedure in the House. These rules are made, of course, as you all know, for the purpose of protecting and safeguarding the Treasury of the United States when such bills as this come forward.

This Committee on Claims, Mr. Speaker, is the oldest committee in the House, and this committee is fenced about by certain privileges. Why do the rules say it shall go there? So that it shall be investigated by a committee that is accustomed to this character of investigation. If you yank this bill out of their hands and throw it over to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Rules without any investigation whatever, if they have not time or opportunity to pass upon one single, solitary item here, and they did not, you destroy all the rules which the House has made; and if you are going to go whistling by every station that warns of danger and which recent rules have established, you might as well have no rules. These rules are put there, Mr. Speaker, so that that can not be done. They say, "Here is a station; stop here; leave it to the Committee on Claims and have them investigate it."

The Committee on Claims can report or go to the Committee on Rules and say to them, "We would like to have this bill hurried." But here is the Committee on Military Affairs, which has made in effect no investigation. Its report does not show the veracity of one item out of six thousand six hundred and sixty-nine, involving several billions of dollars. The Comptroller of the Treasury has decided that these claims are not legal, and yet they come in here and in three hours' time want to authorize somebody who has no jurisdiction to act like a court and pass upon these claims in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which fixes jurisdiction in courts only. There are plenty of people in this war, Mr. Speaker, that need help quickly, but there is no more hurry about these people than there is about plenty more.

Now, to review this particular bill and show how pertinent to it my point is, it develops from the hearings on this bill that early in the great Civil War it was ascertained that great contractors, supply men, and factories were in the habit of getting their friends into these departments and surreptitiously securing improper contracts. The statute was passed in 1862, and it went through the Civil War successfully, providing that everything should be done in writing, and requiring that the man who on the part of the Government made the contract should say under oath that he was not concerned in it. That rule prevailed in the Civil War. What happens in connection with this report? They have violated that statute. They have laid themselves open to criminal prosecution.

We know that many men came here as "experts" who were from some of those great factories. What implication is natural? These people come here and say, "Now, we have violated the law; we did not make a written contract." That was easy to do—to make a blank affidavit. "We did not make an affidavit. We want an amnesty proclamation; that is not all. We want authority to pass upon the contracts we did not make, and to pay out $4,000,000,000 and more concerning which there is no contract whatever." The bill speaks of "informal contracts." There is no contract in any of these claims. On the contrary, every one represents a violation of the law.

I doubt not, Mr. Speaker, that some of them are just claims for unliquidated damages and can be presented like other just claims, and should be, and that some method should be taken to meet them. But it is inevitable, when you allow a department that has thus violated the law to pay out billions of dollars, as this will, in 30 days, as they expect to, according to their own suggestion, that a large number of mistakes are bound to be made. Money is hard to get, Mr. Speaker, and the American people have paid taxes enough, "sight and unseen." I do not think this House should ever pay out billions of dollars any more without knowing what they are for. It is our duty to interpret the rules of this House, not loosely but strictly now, in defense of the taxpayers.

I want to leave that thought, including this suggestion in regard to this matter, and to show just briefly in review that I think this thing, more than any bill that has been before the House for years, should be proceeded with in a careful and orderly manner before we authorize somebody who has already violated the law to throw out billions of dollars. We have rules such as I have outlined and should use them. I ask that this bill be declared out of order and referred to the Committee on Claims for orderly procedure.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take the time of the House to undertake to make a parliamentary argument. That is not my forte, and the question of the wisdom or the folly of enacting the proposed legislation is not involved in the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. In my humble judgment, this bill was properly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, because it is not a claim bill. It is simply a bill which proposes to give additional jurisdiction to the War Department. And if we are going to add to the jurisdiction of the War Department or pass any legislation having to do with the War Department, or to create a tribunal where these claims may be settled—and the bill provides that that tribunal shall be in the War Department—surely no man can say that the bill was not properly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I present two or three citations to show that this is a public bill and not a private bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will be very glad to hear from the gentleman on that proposition, but the Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he does not think that that question is necessary to be determined by the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. STAFFORD. I agree with the Chair completely that it is not necessary in the ruling of the Chair. But as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] has bottomed his whole argument on the fact that this is a private bill I merely wanted to call to the attention of the Chair two or three citations which show positively that it is not a private bill but a public bill. And if it is a public bill, the fact that it has been erroneously referred, after it is reported it is too late to raise the question of jurisdiction.

I wish to direct the attention of the Chair to the third volume of Hinds' Precedents, section 2614:

A bill which applies to a class and not to individuals as such is a public bill.

I shall not stop to read the decision of the occupant of the chair on that point. That is confirmed in volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents, section 3285, which reads as follows:

A private bill is a bill for the relief of one or several specified persons, corporations, institutions, etc., and is distinguished from a public bill, which relates to public matters and deals with individuals only by classes.

The Statutes of the United States provide:

The term "private bill" shall be construed to mean all bills for the relief of private parties, bills granting pensions, and bills removing political disabilities.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. LITTLE. Does that include the French spoliations, which the Chair has ruled are private claims, and has so held?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the case just referred to by the gentleman from Kansas, the French spoliation claims were claims payable to individuals per se and not to classes.

Mr. LITTLE. Every one of these claims is payable only to an individual.

Mr. STAFFORD. The framework of the bill itself shows that it is for the purpose of providing payment for classes and not to individuals; that it is for establishing the agency whereby the claims of the Government may be paid to certain classes. Under the statutes of the United States describing what a private bill is, and under the invariable precedents that have been made construing and distinguishing what are private bills and what are public bills, the bill that is now before the House is a public bill. It being a public bill, I do not intend to argue whether it should have been referred to the Committee on Claims or the Committee on Military Affairs, because the precedents are all on one side, that if a public bill is erroneously referred to a committee of the House, it is too late to raise that question after it is reported back to the House.

And then, going beyond that, the Committee on Rules have a right to make an order as to any character of legislation that they see fit, and that is the purpose of the rule now before the House. It makes in order a certain bill and states specifically that an amendment reported by the committee shall be considered in lieu of the bill. The mere fact that a committee may not have had jurisdiction to report a bill may be the very reason why the Committee on Rules should bring in a rule to make the bill in order to be considered. The Committee on Rules are supreme in determining what shall be considered. They can present a report making in order anything they see fit. They can make in order a private bill if they see fit. They can make in order a private and a public bill or they can link together and make in order a private and a public bill and say that that shall be the business in order before the House.

I merely rose to cite these precedents, which seem to be clear that this is a public bill and not a private bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The Chair is prepared to rule. The immediate matter before the House is House resolution 487, presented by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] as a report from the Committee on Rules. That resolution provides for the consideration of H. R. 13274. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] makes the point of order that the bill, when originally introduced, was improperly referred, and further that because of the improper reference the Committee on Rules has no authority to bring in a resolution for its consideration.

Upon the question whether it was improperly referred the Chair does not feel that it is now necessary to pass. That point would involve the question of whether it is a public bill or a private bill. The Chair has a very clearly defined idea about the character of the bill, but so far as the immediate question before the Chair is concerned, it seems that the question is whether the Committee on Rules has the authority to report the resolution that has been presented by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Paragraph 47 of Rule XI, touching the question of reference of resolutions, provides as follows:

All proposed action touching the rules, joint rules, and order of business shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Then paragraph 56 of Rule XI provides:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration thereof the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not mean to interrupt the Chair, but may I ask a question? Suppose a Member should introduce a bill and mark it "Referred to the Committee on Rules," and it should go to that committee, would the Committee on Rules acquire jurisdiction of it by that and have the right to bring in a rule about it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee on Rules is not a legislative committee. It is merely a procedure committee. This bill did not go to the Committee on Rules. That which the Committee on Rules has reported is a mere resolution providing for procedure.

Mr. LITTLE. That does not answer my question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only limitation laid upon the Committee on Rules by the general rules of the House is that which I now read:

The Committee on Rules shall not report any rule or order which shall provide that business under paragraph 7 of Rule XXIV shall be set aside by a vote of less than two-thirds of the Members present—

That refers to the Calendar Wednesday rule—

nor shall it report any rule or order which shall operate to prevent the motion to recommit being made as provided in paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

Those two propositions are the only limitations placed by the general rules of the House upon the Committee on Rules in reporting orders of procedure. The Committee on Rules can report a resolution discharging any committee of the House from further consideration of any bill that has been referred to it and providing that the bill shall be placed upon its passage. It always rests with the House whether it will adopt the rule reported by the Committee on Rules. The limitations upon the power of the Committee on Rules to report are the two that the Chair just read.

This is a resolution of procedure. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the rule be limited to 80 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by myself and 40 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on the rule may proceed for not exceeding 80 minutes, one-half to be controlled by him and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], at the end of which time the previous question upon the rule shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina or some one else whether it is expected that the consideration of this bill will be concluded to-day? In other words, whether we shall have a night session?

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I can not answer that question. If I may express my individual opinion, it is that we will not be able to conclude this bill to-day.

Mr. MANN. That would be my opinion, but I did not know.

Mr. DENT. I should be very glad to stay here and finish this bill to-night, but I would not like to impose on the House.

Mr. MANN. There is no intention of doing that.

Mr. DENT. No present intention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Reserving the right to object, will the debate be upon the bill?

Mr. POU. The gentleman knows how debate is usually conducted here. The time that I am asking for is for debate upon the resolution now pending.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The resolution itself prescribes that the debate shall be upon the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. POU. That will be after we go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I simply threw out the suggestion to see whether the House desired to economize time.

Mr. MANN. Anybody can make a point of order in the debate on the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for the consideration of one of the most important bills that this House has been called on to consider during this Congress. The bill comes, as I am informed, with almost the unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs. The action of the Committee on Rules, if I am not mistaken, was unanimous. The question as to the wisdom of the provisions of this bill would hardly be proper for discussion at this time. I understand that there have been two proposals; one is to give the Secretary of War the authority to adjust these claims, if you are pleased to call them so, and the other is that a commission shall be appointed to consider such claims.

I respectfully submit that the Secretary of War is the proper person to deal with this matter. He is the man that has been the central figure in making these contracts, and he is the man who is best fitted of all men to settle all differences to which the Government is a party. In any event, there ought to be action by this Congress, and action speedily, because there are men whose financial solvency depends on a speedy payment of whatever amounts they are to receive.

When America entered the war there were patriotic citizens who offered their all, who said to the Government, "Here is my business; take it." It was not an uncommon thing for a man with a large business to voluntarily surrender that business to the Government.

Suddenly the armistice was agreed to. Now it is of the supremest importance to these men that they be put back on a peace basis. I am informed that there are a number who can not be put back until after the settlement with the Government. We have got to trust some one in the adjustment of these matters. There is always a danger that there may be a mistake in the settlement of claims of this kind. I submit that the record of the War Department justifies this Congress in putting the settlement of these matters into the hands of the Secretary of War.

Mistakes may have been made. There may have been a waste of funds, always more or less unavoidable during war, but so far as I know, up to this good hour, there has been no finger of suspicion pointed at the distinguished gentleman who heads the War Department. He has gotten results far beyond the expectation of anyone, and his entire conduct has been above reproach.

As was so tersely stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in the hearing the other day, if this measure is postponed the Government will have to pay compound interest. If adjustment is postponed six months the claims get larger; if 12 months larger still; indeed the longer the postponement the larger the amount the Government will pay. Any gentleman who has had experience in dealing with claims against the Government knows that every day and every month matters of this kind are put off the Government is the sufferer.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. For a question.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman explain upon what theory the claims could get larger?

Mr. POU. Well, men's memories are very elastic. Men forget about conditions. The gentleman from Illinois is a lawyer and knows how claims can grow. Witnesses who know about the transactions die. And that suggests to my mind the fact that men who know about these transactions are, a great many of them, at the present time at the call of the Government. A large number of witnesses who can give information with respect to these claims are at the call of the Government, but they are being rapidly demobilized. The persons are accessible, but every month that the settlements are put off men become scattered more and more, and as time goes by some at least will not be available to give the Government the information that it can get now.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman's statement is true that claims will increase as time goes on, is not that based on the theory that there is going to be dishonesty in connection with them?

Mr. POU. No; I would not charge that. The gentleman knows how after a lapse of time the Government is the sufferer. I do not believe the gentleman himself will controvert that proposition.

Mr. DENISON. I think that is true.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is an element of increase in claims that does not pertain to honesty or dishonesty. It is a matter of interest charges as time runs on. Many a small contractor had to borrow money to finance his little plant or shop while the larger contractor was financed by the Government. These people who had to borrow money must pay interest, and as time goes on their claim for reimbursement must be larger.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. These claims are presumptively illegal. How can damages be increased on an illegal claim?

Mr. POU. The very fact that they are illegal opens the door for the very suggestion that I have thrown out. The reason the Government is going to pay them is because the Government realizes that they are equitable claims. The gentleman served in the Committee on Claims, and I do not believe that he can refute the proposition that the longer you put off matters of this kind the larger the amounts demanded become.

Mr. DILLON. They will only grow by the consent of Congress; being illegal claims they will remain illegal claims.

Mr. POU. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to conclude with this observation. We are now paying the penalty of this war. This is one of the many penalties that we are to pay. Others will come. The penalty in the loss of life is so great that the conscience of the whole world is shocked. I venture to express the hope that in the end some agreement will be arrived at among the great nations of the earth, that they will rise to the requirements of the hour, that they will satisfy the aspirations of the world, and in the end an arrangement will be made that such a tragedy will not be possible in the future. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied nine minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask a question? Has any time been reserved for the opponents of the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not answer that question. The time is in control of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the adoption of this rule which makes it possible to consider the legislation known as the Army contract bill. I listened very carefully to the statements made by Secretary Baker and his Assistant Secretaries before the Committee on Rules the other day. I have been over that testimony very carefully since and have tried to get as much information as possible from other sources, until I am thoroughly convinced that the needs of the Government, the needs of the individual contractor, and the needs of business at large demand some legislation along this line. By the signing of the armistice we find ourselves confronted with this situation: We have two kinds of contracts in the War Department, one which is recognized as a formal contract—that is, a contract that has been officially signed by the authorized representative of the Government and also by the individual contractor or corporation—and another which is known as an informal contract. And the only difference is, one has been all through all the red tape of the War Department, signed, sealed, and delivered, while the other has only been started on this long routine journey. The agreement has been made, quantity and price agreed upon, and in nearly all instances the contractors have begun on the work, and if the armistice had held off a few days longer the contracts that the Comptroller of the Treasury now rules as informal would have been completely signed and just the same as the others. The obligation and good faith of both contracting parties are exactly the same, only by cutting some of the red tape of the War Department and starting people working on these contracts before they were signed the department was able to expedite production of articles that were urgently needed by the Army.

There is absolutely nothing illegal about them. They are exactly the same in every way as the Government has used in the expenditure of billions of dollars, and all the department is asking for is the right to go along and close them up in a businesslike manner, which would have been done before now if it had not been for the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury. The comptroller has ruled that as long as these war supplies are no longer needed, it is not possible for the department to make contracts for them. Therefore, they come before us asking for an enabling act, which is nothing more nor less than authority to go along and justly, quickly, and economically meet their honest obligations that have been created in our strenuous and rapid accumulation of supplies.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SNELL. In just a moment and I will yield. The whole world, especially our own people, demanded that the War Department get material needed for the Army quickly, and in order to do that it was absolutely necessary for them to call in various contractors throughout the country and make arrangements with them to go forward at once producing certain kinds of supplies and material, with the understanding that in a short time or as quickly as possible a legal or formal contract would be forwarded to them, and that they in turn would sign the same and return it to the Government. As far as these formal contracts are concerned, they do not need any new legislation. The War Department is allowed to go on and settle up those contracts with as little loss as possible to the Government and every single thing that is asked at the present time, under the bill to be considered, is for authority to settle these informal contracts on the same basis that they are allowed by law at the present time to settle the formal contracts.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

Mr. SNELL. Not now; if I have time later I will be pleased to yield. As far as the informality of these contracts is concerned they are just as legally binding on this Government, and this Government is just as much under obligation to pay for the material contracted for of the various individuals throughout the country on account of these contracts as it is on account of a contract which has been fully signed and executed. Our moral and legal obligation is just exactly the same, but on account of certain red tape that we all complain about in the War Department they have not been formally executed, and as I look at it the only thing they want to do is to be allowed to settle them up and that I believe is the sensible and businesslike thing to do.

We need this legislation specially to take care of the foreign situation, as we have millions of dollars of contracts over there, and the large majority of them, according to the comptroller's ruling, are informal ones.

For instance, we have in Great Britain three kinds of contracts: First, a contract direct with the British Government for artillery, which can only be purchased from the Government; second, contracts which were placed for us by the British with their manufacturers; they were simply our agents, and of these there are a very great number; third, contracts of more recent date, which have been placed with British commercial houses by the British Government for us, but made on their own responsibility, with the understanding that we would stand back of them. Now, all these English contracts have termination clauses, which the British Government are taking advantage of, and they will settle ours in the same way if we will only give the War Department power to go ahead and settle. They at the present time are settling their contracts with the individual contractors by paying them about 10 or 12½ per cent. If they had a contract with a man or a corporation for $100,000 worth of aeroplane supplies, none of these supplies having been delivered, but the contracting party having entered upon the manufacture of the same, they would go to the company and say, "Here, we will pay you $10,000 or $12,000; you keep all your raw material; and we to be free from any further obligations in regard to the contract." We can settle all of our contracts on practically the same basis if you will give the War Department authority to act, and act now. And I am frank to say that if we can get out of these foreign contracts on that basis, that is as cheap a settlement as you will ever be able to make, and one that should be entirely satisfactory to our Government. On the other hand, if we do not accept this at once, they are going right along and will manufacture and be ready to deliver to us hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of supplies and equipment of various kinds that we have absolutely no use for whatever and will be practically a dead loss to this Government.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not claim anybody would deliver any supplies under the contracts covered by this bill, because they are not contracts at all?

Mr. SNELL. That is exactly what I mean. The gentleman may have his time later. Let me make my statement in my own time. These contracts were entered into in good faith by the British Government, and they are just as morally and legally binding on the American people as they would be if they had all the seals of the War Department of Washington on them, and you will find they are so considered by the British Government.

In France, Italy, Spain, and Switzerland we also have similar contracts that must be settled, and there is no possible way of settling them except by some special legislation, and I maintain it is economy on the part of this Government to act at once and get out from under these foreign contracts as quickly as possible; that it is better to pay a few hundred thousand to settle than to continue hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of contracts for supplies in a foreign land that we have no use for. And I am entirely convinced that we can settle every one of our contract obligations now cheaper than we can at a later date, and the longer they go the more it will cost the Government.

Furthermore, the business conditions of our own country rightly demand to know what the immediate policy of the Government is toward its contractors. The larger part of our manufacturing power has been devoted to Government work. Thousands of small manufacturers have their entire capital tied up or obligated on these Government contracts, and they can not adjust themselves to peace-time industry or start their normal activities until they get their pay from the Government, and unless they know that they are going to get their pay from the Government and contracts satisfactorily adjusted at an early date a large number will be forced to suspend activity for the present.

Suspension of activity by any of our industries at the present time would be one of the greatest calamities that could possibly befall us. The question of surplus labor and what to do with the discharged soldiers and the thousands of men let out by munition, shipping, and various war manufacturers is most serious at the present time, and I know of no one thing that will go further toward solving the labor problem than the enacting of some enabling legislation whereby the War Department can immediately settle up its war contracts and give the various contractors throughout the country their money so they can at once begin to employ this surplus labor in the channels of legitimate peace industries.

Therefore I maintain by passing this enabling act you will not only save money for the Government but you will do something that will prove a positive advantage to the labor situation during the reconstruction period.

I am willing to join with you in placing all the safeguards possible around it, and no man can successfully contend but that this legislation is needed, and if there is any fault anywhere, it will be in the administration of the act rather than in the enabling principle contained in the act itself and for which I am contending at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the life of Col. Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the life of Col. Roosevelt. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to call the attention of Members of the House to two matters which I deem of importance. One is a hardship which some men in our Navy now seem to be undergoing after having their application for discharges acted upon favorably, by reason of the fact that they are indebted to the Navy in a small sum and are kept in the service until they settle the account owing to the Government, illustrated by the following letter, which I have received from a young Concho County, Tex., constituent:

RECEIVING SHIP,
Mare Island, Cal., December 31, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I desire to call your attention to a rule in the Navy that is working quite an injustice with many who have had their applications for discharges approved by the proper authorities.

It is this: Many drawing only $35 or $40 per month bought liberty-loan bonds, despite the fact that they had allotments and insurance. In quite a few cases (in their patriotic enthusiasm) they bought too heavily, and they will only draw one, two, or three dollars each month above the insurance, allotment, and liberty-bond payment. Many overdrew their clothing allowance and were a little overpaid by the Government.

Although they are now needed to farm or to return to some essential industrial occupation, and their applications for discharge are already approved, if they are a little in debt to the Government they can pay the debt only by serving it out. Since their salary is all taken up except a few dollars it may take quite a while in some cases to pay this amount to the Government.

Why couldn't he be trusted with this small sum, when it would mean so much to the men who bought more bonds than they were really able to pay for?

I call this to your attention, believing that it is your wish to aid these men in the service who have given their time and all to aid democracy.

Thanking you in advance, I am,
Most sincerely, your friend, EMSY H. SWAIN.

The question is simply this: These young sailors have made an allotment out of their salaries to their parents. They have purchased liberty bonds. They have taken out insurance, and it all leaves them with only two or three dollars each month for their own use. They have overdrawn their clothing allowance; their application for discharge has been granted, and yet because they owe some seven or eight or nine dollars to the Government are held in the service, so this young man claims, until that is paid from this one or two or three dollars a month which they are entitled to receive, left out of their salaries. If this is the case, it is an outrage and a disgrace upon our Government. A young man who has given his all in the service, after he is entitled to a discharge and his discharge is granted, is held in the service because he owes two or three or four or five dollars.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman taken this matter up with the Navy Department and gotten any reply?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not; but that leads me to another matter. Several months ago I received a telegram from one of my constituents in Ovalo, Tex., asking for a report on a young soldier, Clyde Enoch Shaw, giving his company number, and so on. I called on The Adjutant General's Department for a report. It reported to me from the casualty branch that no casualty has occurred to this soldier. I so wired my constituents that no accident or casualty had happened to the soldier, and in a few days received by mail from my constituent in Ovalo, Tex., the following telegram, dated October 2, 1918, from The Adjutant General's office advising that the soldier had been seriously wounded in France on September 17, 1918, sent by the department several weeks previous to their report to me of no casualty:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 2, 1918.

Mr. REUBEN S. SHAW,
Route 1, Ovalo, Tex.:

Deeply regret to inform you that it is officially reported that Pvt. Clyde Enoch Shaw, Infantry, was severely wounded in action September 17. Department has no further information.

HARRIS,
Acting The Adjutant General.

I then by telephone called upon the department time and again for them to ascertain and report to me what had become of this soldier, who was severely wounded September 17, 1918, but could not get any information whatever. Finally I wrote The Adjutant General on December 19, 1918, the following letter:

DECEMBER 19, 1918.

Hon. P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GEN. HARRIS: I herewith inclose a letter from one of my constituents, Miss Neeta Shaw, of Ovalo, Tex., requesting information concerning her brother, about whom I have had several conversations with your office over the telephone during the past four weeks.

Full data is given in this letter identifying this soldier, and as his family is very uneasy about him, and inasmuch as several incorrect reports were given me by the casualty division of your office, increasing their suspense, I will ask you to kindly give me a definite, correct report as to his present condition.

If it is possible for you to do so, I would like for you to cable for definite information, if same is necessary.

Kindly give this case prompt attention, and oblige.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

Not getting a reply, I continued to telephone the casualty branch of The Adjutant General's Department, but the only information I could get was that Clyde E. Shaw was severely wounded September 17, 1918. Finally, on January 3, 1919, I received the following letter from The Adjutant General advising that all the information he could give was that Clyde E. Shaw was severely wounded on September 17, 1918, and he referred me to the Red Cross here in Washington for further information:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 3, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of December 19, 1918, and regret to advise that this office has received no further information concerning Pvt. Clyde E. Shaw, Company M, Three hundred and fifty-ninth Infantry, than that he was wounded severely in action September 17, 1918.

For more information concerning his condition his sister should write to Bureau of Communication, American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

I have referred your letter to the Surgeon General for information concerning him, and you will be advised his report when received.

Respectfully,

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time is in control of the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I am referred to the Red Cross here in Washington, D. C., for a report concerning a soldier severely wounded in France on September 17, 112 days ago. On January 4, the day I received this letter from The Adjutant General, I wrote him another letter, giving him the facts in full and sending it by special delivery, stating that the man had been wounded 112 days ago in France—wounded severely; that I had called upon the department numerous times for information and asked for a definite report concerning his condition, which letter I insert:

JANUARY 4, 1919.

Brig. Gen. P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GEN. HARRIS: For two months, by numerous requests over the telephone and in other ways, I have been trying to get some definite information concerning the condition of one of my constituents, Clyde E. Shaw, of Company M, Three hundred and fifty-ninth Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces, reported severely wounded in action on September 17, 1918.

I have just received your letter of January 3, 1919, answering a letter I sent you December 19, 1918, wherein you advise me that the only information you can furnish me is that this soldier was severely wounded in action September 17, 1918, and you advise me to call on the Red Cross here in Washington for further information.

It has now been 109 days since this soldier was severely wounded in France, during all of which time his family has been kept in suspense, notwithstanding the fact that they have called on your department numerous times, and my office has called on your department many times for information concerning him. Am I to understand that your office makes no effort whatever to furnish information of this character to a Representative, and that my only means of ascertaining what became of a soldier constituent, severely wounded 109 days ago, is to call on the Red Cross here in Washington?

If this is the last recourse, then in my judgment there is something radically wrong with the efficiency of such a system.

If this was the only case where upon urgent insistence I have been unable to get definite information from your department, I might not complain. But in numerous instances the casualty branch of your department has reported to my office by telephone that it had no casualty report upon soldiers when I would later find that several weeks previous to such a report your office had sent a telegram to the relatives of such soldier that he had either been severely wounded or killed.

I will thank you for a prompt answer.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

Up to this good day I have not received a reply. Since their notification October 2 that Clyde Shaw had been seriously wounded in France on September 17 the family of this soldier have suffered the tortures of the damned, waiting for news, yet I can get them no information.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the gentleman about the Red Cross. Do they say they are permitted to use the cables to inquire about wounded soldiers?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know; but, as I say, this is in the hands of the War Department, and we ought certainly to be able to get information concerning a man who has been wounded since September 17, 1918, and I am getting tired of making the demand for information that the mother and the father of the soldier are entitled to receive and having my letter sidetracked and pigeonholed for a month and a half and not getting any reply. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BLANTON. I do.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the gentleman know the cables have been pretty busy reporting the festivities abroad?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not help that, but I think we ought to be able to get this information from the War Department and ought not to be referred to the Red Cross for it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I do.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman's experience is no different, I apprehend, from the experience of every other Member. Does the gentleman expect to introduce a resolution so as to get some results about it or is he merely attempting to give the fact publicity? I believe some action should be taken.

Mr. BLANTON. I want some action to be taken. I want my constituents, the mother and father, in my district to be able to get information concerning the welfare of their son who was reported seriously wounded September 17 last year and concerning whom they have heard nothing for months and months.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman think a department that can not keep track of the people who were killed is a competent department to pass upon four billions of claims in 30 days?

Mr. BLANTON. I think he can pass upon it, because if he had the right to make the contract in the first place he has the right to adjudicate it now.

Mr. LITTLE. I am glad to get the gentleman's view.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE].

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, if there are any constituents in my district who have any claims to adjust coming within this category I do not know it, and therefore I hope I will be acquitted in advance of any motive other than the presentation of the views which seem to me to be correct as applicable everywhere throughout the country. I understand there are, in round numbers, 6,700 such claims, aggregating, in round numbers, $1,600,000,000, involved in this measure. I think one of the most inspiring things that in all my life I ever witnessed was the unanimity with which the business men, small and great, throughout America and in every section and precinct of America responded to the call upon their ingenuity, their plants, their enterprises, and their capital when this war came. If they had not done it we would not have won this war by this time. If they had not done it ultimately we never would have won this war.

They came here by the thousands and the tens of thousands in person and through their accredited representatives in obedience to the printed invitation of those whom you had clothed with authority to make contracts for the supplies requisite to the mighty enterprise, in haste and in confusion, but nevertheless in the finest spirit of Americanism men can ever observe in this world, and they entered in good faith into these arrangements without employing counsel and wiring for their lawyers to come here to see whether technically the contracts were written down as by statute provided. They entered into the contracts with the War Department, as I say, in haste and confusion. They made enormous investments of their own, enormous investments through capital or credit, going to their bank and bankers, and these funds they employed in the enlargement of plants and the acquisition of raw material, the hiring of labor at enormous figures, until the mighty wheels of industry of this country were set on foot as never before, and made this Nation hum with industry as never before on the face of this earth in all recorded time. They made this war machine so powerful and irresistible that we conquered the forces which were opposed to modern Christian civilization. Now, when the armistice comes because we have broken down the mighty plant of German autocracy and the military machine which had been built up for 60 long years, and the excitement passes away and men become economical and critical, it is found in 6,700 instances that an "i" was not dotted and a "t" was not crossed, and therefore the Comptroller of the Treasury rules, and properly so, that those sums of money which ought to be paid for this vast material which made up this mighty war machine can not be paid because the exact wording of the statute has not been followed—the technical requirements provided by statute as to the proper officers to execute the contracts, or only memoranda instead of complete executed contracts, and so forth, notwithstanding the Government got full value and appropriated their products as contemplated.

It is honest to pay it. We, a Nation of 100,000,000 people, with $300,000,000,000 of wealth, owe this money to these American business men. They paid it out for raw material and kept every raw material industry in this Nation going with prosperity; they paid out the money to the workingmen of the Nation at high wages and enabled them to keep pace with the high cost of living; but they can not now collect the money due them because of a technicality. What will you do about it? I hope this rule will be adopted and that this measure, with perhaps some amendments, will pass, in order that the very gentlemen who, with intelligence and patriotism and good sense and perfect honor, made these contracts may themselves settle those contracts and not compel the American business man to be hailed before a commission made up of five or six or seven people acting as a court of claims, and at the end of 18 months, finding a certain amount due, and then have a special bill brought in, many of the parties going bankrupt in the meantime, with their debts and interest falling on them and their resources so extended that they can not borrow again. It is simply common honesty to pay these men inasmuch as you invited them to furnish their money, plants, ingenuity, resources, and experience, all of which were mobilized in this mighty American cause. Just as we invited them to do that, so now we ought promptly to settle their just accounts so that they can run their businesses. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I did not oppose the report on the rule, but I did ask for time enough to examine into the claims of the proponents of the bill in order that I might vote intelligently on the measure. I frankly say that when the suggestion first came up I had some prejudice against the curative legislation proposed. I have gone into the matter carefully by examining the hearings, conversing with some of the parties asking for this measure, and I have no doubt now as to what we ought to do, because these contracts or agreements that have been technically spoken of as illegal are not illegal in the sense that they are without just grounds for fulfillment and are therefore unjustifiable or unlawful, except that the terms of the contract were not written and fully set out, but are supplemental through additional authority, sometimes given over the phone, and at other times by personal instruction without a formal contract, as required by law, and at other times by letter which might alter or modify a former understanding which could not well have been ignored. There is no doubt in my mind about our justification in making these informal agreements legal in a technical way what now are illegal because of the lack of the things I have mentioned. I have noticed there are two elements here which should be considered in our decision as to our duty. If a contractor should have said to the Government, "I can not do what you ask unless I have the formal contract," and should have made that protection a condition of his agreement to respond to the Government's needs, he would have been placed under suspicion at once. In such case the War Department told him to go ahead and the formal contract will follow—should the contractor still refuse until he got the contract, when time was the essence of the completion of it—I am of the opinion that the contractor would have been subject to a charge that he was not loyal. He would have been charged with pro-German sympathies because he was not willing to cooperate with the Government to supply quickly what was necessary for the prosecution of the war. Quite naturally under that condition he would proceed with what he was asked to do, although the order may have gone over the telephone, with no written evidence of the supplemental authority, and no one would argue that he should suffer because he responded to the request. For if he would refuse to do it under those circumstances we all know the contractor would have been subject to adverse criticism.

Then, on the other hand, this contract or agreement made by the War Department is quite different from the usual agreement in that it sometimes took the form of an approach to commandeering. At least it was of the mandatory character. For example, I happen to know of one case, and it is but one of very many others, where an order was given by the War Department and the party said that he could not do it because he had not the necessary equipment, when the War Department requested him to get the equipment. It was found the contractor could supplement his inability by improving the plant just slightly. Such an order in time of war meant really if he did not do it the Government might be called upon to do it, using the equipment after making the necessary changes. The general effect of such a situation was mandatory on the part of the contractor to put the equipment in, which necessitated an additional expense of no permanent value to the plant.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. In a moment.

And if the contractor would refuse to respond, he would again be subject to adverse criticism on the basis that he was not cooperating to supply the needs of the Government. I am trying to see the situation of the contractor as well as the Government. And so there were two elements of contract which must be considered in this discussion—the willingness of a contractor to accept a favorable instruction in lieu of a written contract on the explanation that the written contract would follow after the order had been given. That was one of the elements upon which he operated, and notwithstanding the fact he must have known the effect such supplemental advices would work, yet I rather think he can not be condemned for doing it. If there is any condemnation, it would be on the War Department in not having the necessary comprehension of the needs of the Government so as to make the terms at once plain and ample. The War Department not having this comprehension but in a mandatory way the power to say, "I want you to do it; go to the necessary expense to put your plant in position to do it," the contractor who responded to the mandatory requirement should not be allowed to suffer. These facts fully explained remove the suspicion I had, and I am therefore in favor of this proposed curative legislation. The error, if error there is, should be placed where it belongs. If there is anything wrong, it is the short-sightedness of the War Department and not the contractor. I am not now assuming to say that the War Department could have under the circumstances prevented all this confusion. I am convinced, however, that with the progress of the preparation for our defense the grossest inefficiency and wasteful practices known to government were too apparent for comment.

Now I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. Now, in the case described by the gentleman from Ohio there would be a written memorandum on one side, at least, and probably on both sides?

Mr. FESS. Yes; quite likely that would be true.

Mr. JUUL. And if the Government made a proposition and that was accepted by a contractor there was a complete meeting of minds and a contract such as any honest man would respect. Is not that correct?

Mr. FESS. Assuming your premise is correct——

Mr. JUUL. I am basing my question on your statement. In the case stated by the gentleman from Ohio there was an actual offer made by the Government and it was accepted by the contractor, and I would suggest in such case no honest legislator would want to not pay the bill.

Mr. FESS. I do not think anyone would refuse to pay a bill based upon such a contract, and it seems to me we ought not to hesitate in our duty, even though there is a lack of business sense or a looseness in the method of procedure on the part of the Government, and we ought not to cause some one who had no choice in the matter to suffer because of that looseness. The Government's duty in the fulfillment of its obligations is clear even though there appear irregularities on the part of the Government. These irregularities whether caused by hopeless incompetency, which is too apparent throughout this administration, as attested in numberless cases, or whether due to a business too stupendous to be comprehended, should not be ground for discrimination against one who in good faith responded to the Government's needs.

Mr. JUUL. If he acted in good faith?

Mr. FESS. Yes; if he acted in good faith.

Now, I yield to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Has the gentleman received any evidence or does he know of any statement showing authoritatively what proportion of these informal contracts were entered into in the last five days preceding the 12th of November?

Mr. FESS. I do not have the information as to the proportion.

Mr. SLOAN. It would be an important fact, would it not, to know, and we ought to have it?

Mr. FESS. I am of the opinion that that would not change the duty on the part of the Government to fulfill its obligation, to pay the obligation that the contractor had undertaken, especially if the contractor had no choice in his contract, as was often the case.

Mr. SLOAN. It should probably prompt a special investigation, however, relative to it.

Mr. FESS. I reply to my friend that I am talking on why we submitted this rule and not on the merits of the bill. I am, however, of the opinion that there should be some amendments made to this bill.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a fact that any individual, any good business man, who would have a contract, as the Government did, under pressure, would want to settle these claims as soon as possible while his memory was fresh?

Mr. FESS. I am of the opinion that it would be rather unwise to allow any cumulative claims that might come with the lapse of time. We are all well aware of the ease with which claims against the Government are filed; and I would also frankly state, although I did not intend to say it at this time, that the question of submitting these points to commissions might delay the adjustment, and it might, since with the lapse of time of settlement claims multiply, increase the expense to the Government. However, with these considerations before us, I am not wholly satisfied in my own mind that it would be wiser for the Secretary of War to undertake all of these adjustments himself, for many reasons, among which I mention one: Not longer ago than this noon I was told that out of the 4,000 officers housed here in Washington under the War Department in our temporary quarters on the Mall, from 40 to 50 of the men are about to be detached, to be attached to the Judge Advocate General's office, in order to be ready and properly located in different sections of the country to make the adjustment of these claims before the proposed commission. I am also told that if that adjustment is not satisfactory to the parties in interest, they propose to appeal them to the Court of Claims. I do not like that suggestion at all. However, that is somewhat extraneous and is a mere mention of the reported expectation of some of our many officers stranded here in Washington on Uncle Sam's pay roll.

Mr. GORDON. In response to the last observation that the gentleman has made, I would say to him that under this bill there can not be any appeal from the Court of Claims because the decision of the Court of Claims is final, so that the gentleman may rest assured as to that.

Mr. FESS. I think that is a good point, and evidently has not been detected by the parties quoted.

Mr. GORDON. I would like, since the gentleman has investigated this question so closely and is an authority on constitutional law——

Mr. FESS. Oh, leave that out——

Mr. GORDON. To know what the gentleman has to say as to the propriety, from the standpoint of the public, of having these claims submitted to judicial scrutiny?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GORDON. Will not some gentleman yield to my colleague some more time?

Mr. FOSTER. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. FESS. My colleague desires not to embarrass me, evidently, although that prefatory remark of his would indicate that he has some mischief in his make-up. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. No; it is in good faith, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. The adjustment of any point of dispute, I think, ought to entail the privilege of a judicial settlement.

Mr. GORDON. This does not, however.

Mr. FESS. And for that reason it seems to me that anything we can do in the way of expedition so as not to bankrupt innocent men who have gone into this business in good faith ought to be resorted to immediately.

Mr. GORDON. But the gentleman forgets that the whole argument for this bill is that if you subject these claims to judicial scrutiny you are going to bankrupt the contractor.

Mr. FESS. Yes. That danger comes through delay of adjustment. The reason I looked with suspicion originally upon this curative legislation was that in the stress of war we so readily do things which, if it were not war, we would not do at all, and we justify ourselves, and quite justifiably, on the grounds that we have no choice. This sense of compulsion excuses the most palpable and inexcusable wastefulness. We pass over what ordinarily would shock the Nation. I have in mind such cases as the Hog Island situation, for example, where $21,000,000 was the original contract, afterwards increased to $27,000,000, and now we find that it has reached $61,000,000, or 300 per cent above the original agreement. When we urge that there ought to be economy exercised we are told officially, "To hell with your economy; we intend to win the war." That was a very popular thing to do and say. It was an expression of the determined will of the Nation to win at all cost. No one will find fault with the determination, but it can not be the shield of rank inefficiency and a wastefulness that is simply appalling, as is evidenced in every activity of the War Department, not only while the war was on, but even to-day. We must put on the brakes to this wastefulness, and I know it will be done in time, but it must not work an injustice to men who are carrying out agreements because of some technicality caused by the Government. We have got to adjudicate these differences with the best facility possible, and with the least expense to the Government on the basis that it is a bad situation in which we have found ourselves, out of which we must emerge in the best way possible, and with the least injury to innocent parties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to ask some questions of somebody who is able to give me the information desired about this procedure. I gather that certain contracts were in process of negotiation when the armistice came. Now, suppose this armistice had not been signed for 30 or 60 days longer and these informal agreements had been entered into as they were. Following the procedure which the department had adopted heretofore, would they then have been properly signed by the department and thereby validated?

Mr. DENT. I suppose perhaps I may be able to answer that, in view of the fact that I heard the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs and before the Committee on Rules. Of course, it was the purpose that these contracts should be executed in due form.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And signed by the proper authorities?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What put a stop to that right?

Mr. DENT. The Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that the representatives of the Government, the officers of the Government, have no authority to ratify any agreement not formally executed at the time it was made.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I understand that; but do the contracts end with the armistice?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no; no, indeed; the contracts do not end with the armistice.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The right to contract, as I understand it, extends through the period of the war?

Mr. DENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, is the war over? Is the war ended?

Mr. DENT. No; the war has not ended.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Then, why can not the official who would be authorized to sign it if the armistice had not been made—why can he not sign it now?

Mr. DENT. Because the Comptroller of the Treasury says he will not recognize any such contract.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Is that because of the signing of the armistice?

Mr. DENT. No; because further production and delivery has been stopped.

Mr. GORDON. Let me give you an additional answer.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that that precise question was put up to the Comptroller of the Treasury as to why these contracts could not be ratified by some officer down there after the signing of the armistice, and I am advised that his reply was that if they did, somebody would go to the penitentiary, under a statute which makes it a felony to buy goods that the Government does not need, or something of that sort. I have not examined into the question.

Mr. LITTLE. That is a simple explanation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. My understanding is that there is a statute, passed many years ago, perhaps during the Civil War——

Mr. LITTLE. In 1862.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. In 1862, I am advised, requiring the Army officer who is authorized to make contracts not only to sign the contract but also to sign an affidavit——

Mr. LITTLE. That is the trouble. That explains the whole thing.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Now, if these contracts could have been signed during the war why can not they be signed now? I should like to know if for all purposes the war is over?

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman let me answer that?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I will. I am asking purely for information.

Mr. DENT. As far as I know that suggestion was made in almost that identical language by a member of the Military Committee when we were considering that proposition, and Mr. Warwick, the Comptroller of the Treasury, who was before the committee, said it could not be done, that the Comptroller only recognized contracts which were coexistent with the trade itself.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Not now. I will in a moment. Then I am to understand that the officer could not sign the contract and validate it if the armistice had not been signed?

Mr. DENT. That is true, as I understand——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. FOSTER. I can give the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield just for a moment? I think I can straighten this thing out. I have been practicing law some years——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I want to make this statement.

Mr. CALDWELL. There is no use——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I think there is. I think it is very necessary that I should make this statement. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Alabama says I have suggested nothing new. That is no surprise at all to me. I did not think I was bringing up any new proposition, and I hoped that as the question has been asked frequently and as the gentleman is familiar with it, he would be able to give some reply that would be satisfactory.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Not now. I have but two minutes. As I understand, these contractors are in no worse situation because of the armistice than they would have been if there had been no armistice; that there never would have come a time when these contracts could have been signed. Now, that being true, I want to ask the gentleman this question—and I am going to vote for the rule, too—I ask this purely for information: Why would it not cure the whole trouble if you passed an act here to authorize the man, whoever he may be, who during the continuance of the war would have the right to make the contract and sign it to sign it now and let these contractors have whatever rights they would have had if they had legal contracts complying with all the requirements of the statute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], wanted to know why it was necessary to have this bill in the form of the one presented. As I understand it, the trouble arose when they attempted to adjust the informal contracts. The Secretary of War assumed that certain sections of the Revised Statutes did not apply when we were in actual hostilities and made informal contracts to supply material to the Government without the formality of a written contract protected as required by the act of 1862 or 1863. When they came to cancel the informal contracts and adjust them they found there was no power by which they could adjust and pay out the money upon that kind of a contract, and it was necessary to authorize an adjustment of these contracts before the men who had in good faith supplied material to the Government could be paid for it. That is the reason why this act was asked of us. Unless you do this these men can not get pay for what they have actually done and for money laid out. It will amount to more than $2,000,000,000. The business of this country can not stand the loss of $2,000,000,000 at this time nor can they stand its being tied up for any considerable period. It is necessary that something should be done here, and at once, in order that the wheels of commerce may continue to turn without interruption.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What percentage of the $2,000,000,000 is due abroad and what in the United States?

Mr. CALDWELL. The $2,000,000,000 I refer to is due here.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GORDON.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, it is a pretty good-sized rule and bill to discuss in four minutes. There is some misapprehension on the part of some gentlemen who have spoken here as to the rights of the Government and the rights of individuals. I take it that where a man has furnished and delivered supplies to the Government, without any contract at all, he is entitled to recover the value of the goods. In fact, he could sue in the Court of Claims for them, and any proper department of the Government has the right to allow and pay for the goods so delivered. This legislation is not invoked for any such purpose as that. It is intended to authorize the reimbursement to contractors for the equitable rights arising under contracts which were in fact and in law invalid contracts. They were no contracts at all.

It is an exceedingly difficult question which has confronted the committee. I think the bill should have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Claims; but it came to us, and we did the best we could with it. We adopted 10 provisos to protect the public interest. The difficulty is that it attempts to confer judicial power on an executive department of the Government. The Constitution provides that all judicial power, in law and equity, shall be conferred on the courts. But we were confronted with the statement that if we undertook to take the time necessary to subject to judicial scrutiny the six thousand and more claims that the loss of time entailed in conducting that investigation would bankrupt some of these men. Personally, I do not think that is a sufficient answer. But none of the other members of the committee agreed with me, and therefore I did not feel justified in bringing in a minority report. The truth about it is that you are conferring upon an executive department of the Government power to adjudicate equitable rights, and that is an authority that ought to be conferred only on some court.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Do the formally executed contracts contain a method of settling disputes?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; our Supreme Court held in the 91st United States that a formal legal contract partially completed, executed in a time of war, might still be adjusted by the payment of a lump sum. Such a settlement as that was made; but that is in apparent conflict with the general rule of law that no executive department of the Government may settle and adjust any claim for unliquidated damages arising out of contracts or tort. That is a broad statement, but it is absolutely the law.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Under the authority that the gentleman has just cited, which holds that the settlement is not the exercise of judicial power, this bill does not confer any judicial functions.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; it does. There the contract was still in force and it was executed in part and was a valid existing contract. Here there is no contract, and you can not properly create equitable rights—I say you can not—Congress can pay the claim without any investigation at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman hold that if the Government agent and the contractor get together and agree on the price that that is a judicial proceeding?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no; not in all cases. We were told in the public press that upon the signing of the armistice the War Department terminated these contracts, and if it did, that creates a claim for unliquidated damages which no executive department of the Government has any legal right to adjudicate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, if this bill validating informal or incompleted contracts had come to the Congress as a result of an armistice 30 days after the declaration of war some apologies might be made for the War Department because of its inability or inefficiency in the conduct of affairs relating to the war and providing for war materials; but in this case the War Department asks for the validation of certain contracts more than a year and a half after the declaration of war and now some 60 days after the signing of the armistice. There is no excuse that can be made for the War Department. Its incompetency to conduct the affairs of the Government in such great matters as providing munitions of war is so manifest that it seems to me men should hesitate before giving this same department a new authorization to settle for the Government with more than 6,000 contractors on invalid contracts amounting to nearly a billion and three-quarters of dollars. The Navy Department is in no such dilemma. The conduct of that department has not been upon the same footing of incompetency as the War Department. They do not come here asking the Congress to validate unlawful, illegal, or incomplete contracts. Their contracts terminated with the signing of the armistice, as the contracts made by the War Department for munitions of war should have provided by their own terms for their termination. But no; "the most efficient public servant the President ever knew" has been so inefficient that he has made a mess of providing munitions of war that his conduct of war contracts will be a scandal in this country for the next quarter of a century.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a very brief question.

Mr. LONDON. Do not the formal contracts have some method of cancellation in the event of an armistice?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Undoubtedly that is provided for. Of course, it should be. The War Department through its incompetency has gotten this Government into this mess. What did the War Department do? For months and months after the declaration of war contractors besieged the War Department for contracts. The hotels of Washington were filled with manufacturers seeking contracts. Nothing was done. May, June, July, August, September passed. Nothing was done. Few contracts were let, and God only knows why. We were in a great war. We needed munitions of war. Gen. Pershing said when the war terminated he had practically no munitions of war furnished by American contractors. Gen. Pershing was forced, so he says in his report, to go to French contractors for guns, for munitions, aeroplanes, artillery, tanks, everything that was essential in prosecuting the war.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. The inefficiency of the War Department in failing to provide munitions of war through American contractors is a reflection upon the War Department rather than upon American business men and American laborers.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would rather proceed. American business men were furnishing arms and ammunition to the belligerents in Europe before we entered the war. There is no excuse, therefore, for the condition in which our War Department found itself during the progress of the war and at the signing of the armistice.

I have no doubt there are many claims that should be adjusted. I have no doubt that many contractors have expended much money and material in preparing to supply the Government with the necessary munitions of war, for which they should be paid, but I doubt seriously that the War Department should make that adjustment. The War Department has not shown itself possessed of the business ability and the judgment necessary to the conduct of large business.

But it is through the War Department that this bill proposes to adjust a billion and three-quarters of dollars' worth of claims for the sincere, hardworking, conscientious body of the American people. Now, observe the attitude of the War Department in its enthusiasm and haste to validate informal or unlawful contracts so that it may be authorized to pay out a billion and three-quarters of dollars to contractors who have furnished so little of munitions of war, who have received from the American people, through the War Department, more money than was ever dispensed by any nation in time of war. We have received less units of arms, of ammunition, and of war materials than were ever received by any people at any time in the history of mankind for the money expended. Now, contrast the attitude of the War Department in its enthusiasm and haste to validate these informal or unlawful contracts with its attitude of inaction during the first months of the war. The War Department shows much zeal in its effort to see what contractors may have their money at the earliest date possible, while millions of men are held in the Army after the war is over, who have sacrificed their positions in civil life, many of them receiving salaries ranging from $1,000 to $5,000 or $10,000 a year, abandoning their business, merchandising, manufacturing, farming, every variety of industry, sacrificing their all to serve for $30 a month. They made allotments to their wives, their mothers, their sisters, their dependents. The soldiers are not paid promptly; the war is over—they are not discharged. The allotments are not being paid. The War Department shows no anxiety; it does not rush here urging that Congress do something to enable it to do what it already has the authority to do and should be doing. Oh, no. It is not even paying the men the $30 a month that is due the soldier. Men are wounded in every hospital along the coast who have been for months without pay, many of their families having been for months without information concerning them. There is much anxiety to pay the contractors who have furnished so little in munitions of war, but no anxiety to make good with the men who gave their limbs, who offered their lives in war, and the statement of the fact is a more serious reflection upon the War Department than I could make. The fact that stands out preeminent against the War Department is the colossal sums that have been expended by the War Department in so short a time, for which so little has been furnished to the men on the fighting front with which to carry on the war.

The fact is, on the other hand, that men from the beginning have suffered for want of hospital facilities and for want of nurses, for want of medical attention, are suffering to-day for want of pay, for want of the ordinary attention they should have. The War Department is conspicuous for its inability to conduct business upon a large scale. Of course, something must be done to have as early an adjustment as possible of these matters. The adjustment should not be made, as it provides in this bill, through the men who have failed even to make valid contracts and who now ask Congress to validate the contracts so they can make adjustments upon them.

I know how difficult it is to terminate the life of a commission. I know how long it takes to secure the completion of a large number of contracts before the committees of Congress. These are matters that should have been foreseen and probably were taken into account by the contractors when they entered into negotiations with the War Department. It is a serious mess we are in, and you can not gloss it over; you can not make excuses that are sufficient. It is a mess that the War Department has gotten the country into, and now seeks to get Congress to help it out of that mess.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think that this mess, upon which the gentleman has been deglutinating for some length of time, would have been made less by waiting for an interminable length of time in order to have new contracts made to get supplies?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; but these contracts should have been made according to law, as the Navy Department made its contracts.

Mr. BARKLEY. The contracts for the Navy were not one one-hundredth part as large as the contracts for the War Department, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the Navy Department did not have half the number of men making the contracts.

Mr. LITTLE. Just as they did in the Civil War.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The truth of the matter is that the Secretary of War has failed to measure up to the standard by which the President measured him as "the most efficient public servant the President had ever known." Either the President is wrong in his judgment of efficiency or the Secretary of War has not given the Government the benefit of his great business ability.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. SLOAN. The President stated that as a piece of humor, did he not, not seriously when he was speaking of the Secretary of War?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, I do not know whether the President was joking or not; he may have been.

Mr. SNYDER. Everybody else thought he was.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This bill should be very materially amended.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. This bill should be amended by the House in the Committee of the Whole and some method arrived at similar to that adopted by the Senate, or the amendment suggested by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Although I do not believe in the creation of commissions, yet somebody besides the War Department should adjust these claims against the Government upon these contracts that were not made according to law. And the War Department does not need further authority to discharge soldiers, and should show more consideration for the men who did the fighting than it has shown. It also should show more consideration for the dependents they left at home than it has been showing them by paying promptly the allotments that are due them.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman just referred to the action of the Senate or the Senate committee. Do I understand the Senate committee has provided a different method for adjustment than was provided in the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the Senate Committee on Military Affairs provided for the appointment of a commission.

Mr. ELSTON. I understand the Senate committee yesterday reversed that——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken and the resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust, pay, or discharge any agreement, express or implied, upon the basis of reasonable value but in no case greater than the agreed price that has been entered into, in good faith during the present emergency and prior to November 12, 1918, by any officer or agent acting under his authority, direction, or instruction, with any person, firm, or corporation for the acquisition of lands, or the use thereof, or for any supplies, material, or equipment to be used in the prosecution of the war, when such agreement has been executed in whole or in part, or expenditures have been made or obligations incurred upon the faith of the same by any such person, firm, or corporation prior to November 12, 1918, and such agreement has not been executed in the manner prescribed by law: Provided, That payment under such agreement shall not exceed the fair value of the property transferred or delivered and accepted by the United States, as determined by the Secretary of War, and where no property has been transferred, delivered, or accepted payment shall not be in excess of the actual cost incurred in preparation for performance, as such cost is determined by said Secretary: Provided further, That this act shall not authorize payment to be made of any claim under such agreements after June 30, 1919: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at the beginning of its next session following June 30, 1919, a detailed statement showing the nature, terms, and conditions of every such agreement and the payment or adjustment thereof: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States upon any agreement of the character herein provided for: And provided further, That no settlement of any claim arising under any such agreement shall bar the United States Government through any of its duly authorized agencies, or any committee of Congress hereafter duly appointed, from the right of review of such settlement, nor the right of recovery of any money paid by the Government to any party under any settlement entered into, or payment made under the provisions of this act, if the Government has been defrauded, and the right of recovery in all such cases shall extend to the executors, administrators, heirs, and assigns, or any party or parties: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any officer or agent of the United States from criminal prosecution under the provisions of any statutes of the United States for any fraud or criminal conduct: And provided further, That this act shall in no way relieve or excuse any officer or his agent from such criminal prosecution because of any irregularity or illegality in the manner of the execution of such agreement: And provided further, That the names of such contractors and the amounts of such partial or final settlements shall be filed with the Clerk of the House for the information of Congress and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or in the Official Bulletin, or as a public document, 10 days before confirmation and payment is authorized upon such contracts.

During the reading of the bill, the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this bill was improperly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and is not properly before that committee, and should be before the Claims Committee. I argued the point a few moments ago, and I do not care to do so further now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kansas that he was in the Hall when the gentleman made his point of order, while the Speaker pro tempore was presiding, and the present occupant of the Chair listened to the argument of the gentleman from Kansas. In the opinion of the Chair the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the Speaker pro tempore, correctly ruled upon the point of order, which I think is binding on the present occupant of the Chair as chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Committee on Rules brought in a rule providing for the consideration of this bill by number. Under the rules of the House, the Committee on Rules can bring in a special order changing and abrogating any rule of the House, with only two limitations, relative to Calendar Wednesday and a motion to recommit. It is in order for the Committee on Rules to bring in a rule providing that a bill that had never been before any committee at all, whether public or private, should be considered, and if the House adopts the special order it changes or abrogates any rules of the House conflicting with the special order.

Mr. LITTLE. How would the Committee on Rules get such a bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Rules is not a legislative committee. The Committee on Rules is not now considering any legislation. The Committee on Rules can bring in a special order for the consideration of legislation and could provide that any Member of the House or any committee could offer a resolution or a bill for immediate consideration that had never been before any committee at all. In the opinion of the Chair, the House having adopted this special order providing that this bill should be considered, and determining how it should be considered, it is not proper for the occupant of the Chair as committee chairman to rule that the bill is not properly before the Committee of the Whole for consideration. The Committee of the Whole is simply a creature of the House. The House has provided that this bill shall be considered. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. May I make one suggestion there?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLE. Have not chairmen ruled, and I think properly, it could be done in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think the Chair held that. I think the Chair stated it was not for him to pass upon it. But that question was not up then for consideration. The present occupant of the chair has distinct ideas on the point of order, and while I do not think it necessary to rule on the point, the Chair will do so. In the opinion of the Chair, the bill before the House is a public bill, and it is too late to raise a question of jurisdiction. The question of estoppel would apply. If the bill—a public one—had been improperly referred, any time before it was reported to the House by the committee a motion would have been in order to correct the reference. Not having been made, it is now too late to make it.

Mr. LITTLE. How can the Chair dispose of the numerous rulings that the point can be made when we are in Committee of the Whole, as in section 4380 and the other sections to which I referred, I think by your distinguished father, where it is repeatedly ruled that after you go into the Committee of the Whole, if the point is made, it can be properly referred. The Rules Committee must certainly be subject to some orderly method of receiving jurisdiction of any bill.

The CHAIRMAN. None of those was considered under a special rule of the House directing that a special bill be considered. The Chair has not examined the precedents cited, but feels sure that if the gentleman will investigate it he will not find any of those bills were ordered considered under a special rule of the House providing for their consideration. The Chair believes that an investigation will show that in the cases cited the House was in the Committee of the Whole House considering the Private Calendar. That the bills were called up in regular order when reached on the calendar and the points of order then made. Under such circumstances it is undoubtedly in order to make a point of order as to jurisdiction of committee. Such a case is very different from the one at bar.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is a small bill, and I think it should be read in order to show what is to be considered.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, if possible, I would like to arrange as to who will have control of the time.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to know what arrangement has been made about controlling the time.

The CHAIRMAN. No arrangement has been made, and the Chair was expecting to hear from the gentleman from Alabama as to that.

Mr. DENT. The rule provides for three hours of general debate. There is no arrangement about division of time. I should like to have an understanding that the time that is to be controlled by those who are in favor of the bill shall be equally divided between the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and myself, or some other member of the Military Committee representing the gentleman from California. I see present the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. What was it? I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. I was suggesting that an hour and a half be consumed by those in favor of the bill, the time to be controlled one-half by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas, as representing the other side of the House, and the other hour and a half I do not know who wishes to control.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state to the gentleman that I am not entirely in favor of the bill as it stands, but I am in favor of its amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think there will be any difficulty about the control of the one hour and a half on this side.

Mr. DENT. Then I suggest that an hour and a half be controlled by myself, to be dispensed among those who are in favor of the bill, and the other hour and a half I do not know what gentlemen want to control. I do not know of any member of the committee who wants to oppose the bill. The committee reported the bill out unanimously.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me, he may have discovered from my few observations with respect to this bill that I am not entirely clear as to the attitude I should take about it. I feel strongly that these claims should be adjusted, but I believe the Government should be protected, and I do not believe it is sufficiently protected by the bill as it now stands. I want to act in good faith with the committee.

Mr. DENT. This statement surprises me, because the motion was made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that the bill be reported out with several amendments, one of which was submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], and there was no objection when the bill was reported out. I made the statement deliberately—and I thought I had the right to make it—that it was reported out by the unanimous report of the committee. I make this statement informally.

Mr. GORDON. If that statement was intended to apply to me, I would like to be heard in regard to it.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, under the rule three hours' debate was provided for on the bill?

Mr. DENT. That is the case.

Mr. MANN. What will be the procedure as to recognition? Will the Chair recognize a gentleman for an hour, the time to be controlled by the gentleman recognized, and then a gentleman in opposition will occupy an hour, the time to be controlled by the gentleman recognized, or will the time be limited unless some arrangement is entered into?

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some arrangement is entered into, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] for an hour, and if anyone opposed to the bill seeks recognition the Chair will recognize him for an hour. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who led the opposition to the bill, wants recognition, the Chair would recognize him for an hour. Then the Chair would recognize some Member in favor of the bill for 30 minutes and some one opposed to it for 30 minutes, on the ground that the rule changes the general rule governing the disposition of time, giving each Member recognized an hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that the time be divided in the regular way and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] control an hour and a half and that this side of the House control an hour and a half. A number of Members have spoken to members of the Committee on Military Affairs on this side of the House and the time has been promised to them regardless of whether they are for or against the bill.

Mr. DENT. I think that is reasonable.

Mr. POU. Will not the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Alabama agree to divide the time as equitably as possible between gentlemen favoring and gentlemen opposed to the bill? If so, I think the membership are willing to trust the fairness of both gentlemen.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to dispose of the time, but I would be satisfied if the time were divided between both sides of the House, providing that those who are opposed to the bill shall have half of the time, if they want it, and that I have a reasonable time myself. If I have that assurance I shall be glad to accede to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas. If not, I think the time should be divided equally between those who favor and those who oppose the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. How much time does the gentleman from Kansas desire?

Mr. LITTLE. About 20 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not believe that 20 minutes can be yielded. I can yield 10 minutes to the gentleman. About a dozen gentlemen desire time. I shall be glad to give the gentleman as much as anybody else.

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman from Kansas desire?

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to have about 20 minutes.

Mr. DENT. I will give the gentleman 10 minutes of the time allotted to this side.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time be equally divided, to be controlled equally by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would the gentleman from Alabama indicate about how far he intends to go in the debate this afternoon before adjournment?

Mr. DENT. My idea is that we will run for about an hour. I thought that would be long enough. That would take us to half past 5. Then I would move to rise. As I understand it, this is a continuing order and the bill would be in order tomorrow morning under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair could not undertake to rule on that.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs has given full and elaborate consideration, I may say, to the proposition involved in this proposed bill. We have had full and complete hearings. We did not adopt the bill as it was prepared in the War Department and sent to the committee. The committee itself worked out a solution, as it thought, of the problem.

I think there has been a great deal of misunderstanding, which can be easily cleared up, on the subject matter of this legislation. Under the provisions of sections 3445 and 3446 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that no Government contract shall be recognized as valid and binding unless it is in writing and signed at the end thereof by the contracting officer and the contractor and an affidavit is made by the contracting officer in the form and manner prescribed by those sections.

The testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs demonstrates that there were some 6,700 contracts, involving about $1,600,000,000, that were not executed with the ceremony and the formalities required by those two sections of the Revised Statutes. The object and purpose of this bill, as the Committee on Military Affairs understands it, is simply to do this, nothing more and nothing less—to authorize the Secretary of War to settle, adjust, and discharge the obligations of these contracts which were not executed with the formalities prescribed by law in the same manner and in the same way that the War Department will settle contracts that were duly and legally executed.

Now, to save my life I can not understand why it is that gentlemen will strain at a gnat and swallow a camel over a proposition of this kind.

I can not understand why we should undertake to have a commission to settle claims on contracts that were not formally executed, although the parties performed every obligation that was demanded of them, and yet allow the Government to proceed with the settlement of claims involving perhaps five or ten times more on contracts that were properly executed. If you are not willing to trust the War Department, if you are not willing to trust the authorities that made the contracts to settle the contracts, then you ought to bring in a bill and provide that the commission should not allow the War Department to settle those contracts that were legally executed and duly and ceremoniously signed, because they involve many more billions of dollars than are involved under the contracts that this bill undertakes to take care of.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I wish the gentleman would let me complete my statement, and then I will be glad to yield. When this bill was under consideration by the committee there was considerable opposition to it to begin with, but I thought the committee finally agreed to report it unanimously; certainly no one reserved the right to make any minority report and there was no objection to the bill being reported. As I stated to a member of the committee who seemed disposed to oppose this bill, let us take this concrete case: Suppose that on the 15th day of October, if that was a week day, the Quartermaster's Department wired some manufacturer to supply the Government with certain war materials needed in the prosecution of the war, and that manufacturer immediately proceeded to comply with the telegraphic order, and the representative of the Quartermaster's Department immediately followed the telegram with a duly executed contract, which was signed by the contractor and the proper officer in the Quartermaster's Department. The goods were delivered and every requirement of the contract was complied with. Suppose on the same day a representative of the Ordnance Department sent a telegraphic order to some contractor or manufacturer to supply the Government with so many rifles or so much ammunition, but the contracting officer failed to follow his telegraphic order with a formal, written contract. In both instances the manufacturer complied with the telegraphic order, the Government received the goods, the Government got the benefit. I would like to ask if any honest man would discriminate between those two cases? Now, that is what this bill undertakes to correct.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield now or would he prefer not to?

Mr. DENT. I would like to finish my statement first.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. All right.

Mr. DENT. In other words, this bill simply declares that the Secretary of War shall be authorized to discharge obligations which were entered into in good faith, where the contract was executed either in whole or in part or where the contracting party made expenditures or incurred obligations on the faith of it, although it was not signed and executed in the manner prescribed by law. Now, that is all that this bill does. I will state the proposition in other terms. I state without fear of successful contradiction that this bill does not do anything more than to authorize the War Department to discharge obligations which, had they been entered into between private parties under similar circumstances, would be enforced by any court of justice in the land.

Now, coming to the proposition that gentlemen are afraid that they are validating frauds, that they are perhaps putting their approval upon corruption, let me call attention to these facts: As I stated a few moments ago, the informal contracts, as they have been called, amount in number to some 6,679, I believe, and involve a little over $1,600,000,000. Now, let us see what we have done since the declaration of war, even during the last year. In the annual Army appropriation bill which became a law on the 9th day of last July Congress appropriated over $12,000,000,000 for the support of the Military Establishment. The Appropriations Committee, which handles appropriations for fortifications and heavy artillery, added $2,800,000,000 to that sum. In October of last year the Appropriations Committee were called on for a deficiency bill of over $6,000,000,000, which Congress passed, most of it applying to the Army. So that within the last seven or eight months we have appropriated over $21,000,000,000 in order to carry on the Military Establishment during the war. And now, because we come before Congress and ask that the Secretary of War be permitted to settle and discharge obligations involving $1,600,000,000, it is said to be a horrible and a terrible proposition that is presented to Congress.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Of course when we appropriated all those vast amounts of money, we assumed that it would be expended legally and under legal contract. That was assumed, was it not?

Mr. DENT. Why, of course.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman make a distinction between the settlement of legal contracts and the settlement of illegal contracts?

Mr. DENT. I do not make any distinction, and that is the very purpose of the bill. It says there ought not to be any distinction where the contracts are entered into in good faith and the Government got the benefit of it and the other party furnished the supplies.

Mr. DENISON. If all the contracts were entered into in good faith, the gentleman says, but how does he know that when the law was not complied with?

Mr. DENT. I know it as well in the contracts that were not signed as I do in those that are properly signed.

Mr. DENISON. But those that were legally signed have been accompanied with the affidavit that there was no interest on the part of the contractor and all competing bids were filed with the department. Now, that protects the people and protects the Government. But in these other contracts the affidavit of disinterestedness was not filed and the competing bids were not filed; can the gentleman make a distinction between the two classes of cases?

Mr. DENT. I do not think there ought to be any distinction between them. I get the gentleman's point, and although it puts me out of my line of argument I will say that if this bill is adopted I challenge any man, any lawyer of the House, to dispute the proposition that if it is discovered hereafter that the contract was made and that the usual affidavit was not filed because the contracting officer wanted to avoid responsibility that he would be guilty of conspiracy to defraud the Government.

Mr. DENISON. How are you going to find that out?

Mr. DENT. The same way that we find out fraud and conspiracy on a contract that was legally executed.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman permit a single suggestion?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If there were any contractors who desired to practice a fraud, would not they see to it that their contracts were executed with the greatest minutia of detail?

Mr. DENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TILSON. And the honest contractors are the very ones that would enter into contracts with less formality.

Mr. DENT. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I think the man who went to work and supplied material under orders given by the War Department without hiring some lawyer to see that the law was complied with is entitled to more consideration than the one who hired a lawyer to see that the contracts were properly executed.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is it claimed by the War Department or the comptroller that because of the armistice the War Department could not go ahead and execute these contracts and then cancel them?

Mr. DENT. No; it is not claimed that they could not do it on account of the armistice.

Mr. MANN. If the war had continued could they have gone ahead and executed the contracts?

Mr. DENT. I can not answer that, but the comptroller holds, as I interpret his statement before the Military Committee of the House, that when the War Department issued orders on the 12th day of November to stop the delivery under the various contracts that had been made, that subsequent to that time a contract could not be formally executed because there was nothing to execute a contract upon, that it must be coexistent with the contract itself.

Mr. MANN. If that is the only reason, the War Department could revoke its order long enough to sign the contract and then order the delivery stopped.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. Did not the comptroller make a ruling to the effect that when the armistice was signed the emergency was passed, and that Congress having provided an appropriation to be expended during the emergency, after the armistice they could not be legally paid?

Mr. DENT. I do not so understand the comptroller's ruling. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. My understanding is this: Suppose the contract was made and the order was given by telegram or telephone, or by a memorandum on the 1st of October; the contractor had made partial delivery but had not delivered the whole, and no formally executed contract was made; that on the 12th of November the department notified the contractor not to make any further deliveries in the performance of the contract. The comptroller holds that subsequent to that time the officer representing the Government could not now sign a contract. In other words, a legally executed contract must take place at or about the time of the transaction.

Mr. MANN. That is based on the order of the War Department stopping deliveries?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MAGEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MAGEE. As I read this bill you would designate the formal contract as one executed in pursuance of law under the formalities of the Federal statute?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MAGEE. And an informal contract as designated is one made by telegram or perhaps a memoranda, but not with the formalities required by statute? Does this bill do anything more, as a matter of fact and law, than place such an informal contract entered into in good faith upon the same basis as a formal contract?

Mr. DENT. That is exactly what the bill does, and I so stated, I thought.

Mr. MAGEE. And there is no question that the Secretary of War would have had ample authority to enter into a formal contract in any one of these instances in which you attempt to give relief?

Mr. DENT. Undoubtedly; and had he done it there would be no necessity for this legislation.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Has there been any question raised by anyone as to whether or not the Government should settle these contracts? Has anyone contended that the Government should not settle the contracts?

Mr. DENT. I have not heard of anyone that was contending it should not.

Mr. McCULLOCH. There have been, then, irregularities that this bill seeks to correct.

Mr. DENT. That is true.

Mr. McCULLOCH. So that the only question is who shall determine the irregularities, whether it shall be the Secretary of War or a commission?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell the House why he believes the men who are responsible for the irregularities should settle the question or why it should not be settled by some one who is disinterested and impartial and who is not responsible for the error?

Mr. DENT. I expected to come to that point when I had an opportunity. I had not yet arrived at it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. DENT. I expect to come to it in due order, but the gentleman will let me state it in my own way.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that every one of these alleged informal contracts is a performance in violation of the law of 1862 and renders the men engaged in it all liable to go to penitentiary—every one of them?

Mr. DENT. I do not think there is any question but that a contract that was signed contrary to the act of 1862, passed during the Civil War, would make the officer liable. I do not remember what the punishment is.

Mr. CALDWELL. But, if the gentleman will yield, the question is whether it was done willfully or with an intent to defraud.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it the purpose of this to make an amnesty for these men?

Mr. DENT. Not at all. If the gentleman has read the bill, he will recall the clause in it that nothing in this act shall estop the Congress of the United States from reviewing it or the Government from recovering for fraud, nor shall it justify the failure of any officer to sign the contract which is prescribed by law.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask why we should return to these gentlemen who are all sitting there with a rope around their necks the authority to execute and complete these performances by which they rendered themselves liable to punishment?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question in order to reply to the question of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How can we punish these men sitting around with ropes around their necks by denying money to honest men who have no ropes around their necks?

Mr. LITTLE. Everyone who got such a contract is liable to the same punishment as an accessory.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then, when a fire breaks out, the village hose company must go to the place to find out where the fire is and then come back to the hose house to consult the statutes before they put out the fire.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, there is nobody hollering fire except the fellows who started the fire.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether, if the House votes the authority sought by this bill, all of the safeguards that the department failed to use when the contracts were let informally will be used before the money is paid? Will the affidavits and the formal protections called for by law be made use of before the money is paid?

Mr. DENT. I can not state to the gentleman that they will require an affidavit in order to do that, but I can state this to the gentleman, that the representatives of the War Department in the hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House and before the Committee on Rules stated—I think they did before the Committee on Rules, and I know they did before the Committee on Military Affairs—that the War Department had a representative, an inspector, at each plant scattered throughout the country, or in different regional sections of the country, that they had a local board representing the Government there, that the contractor, together with the inspector and this local board, would get together upon a settlement of the contracts. This settlement is submitted to a board of review in that particular branch of the War Department and finally may be reviewed by a board acting directly under the Secretary of War. That is the way they settle the valid contracts, and they propose to settle these informal contracts the same way.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will forgive me for just one more question. Is it the intention under this bill to attempt to draft some sort of a legal contract, a contract which they failed to draw up, before settlement is effected?

Mr. DENT. Not at all.

Mr. JUUL. They do not intend to legalize the illegal contracts?

Mr. DENT. On the contrary, there is a proviso in this bill expressly declaring that the settlement made under authority of this resolution shall not give any contracting party the right to sue the Government in any court in the land.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. I want to propound a question to the gentleman relative to real estate. Suppose an officer should make a loose contract for a piece of real estate and some Army officer should enter into possession of that real estate. Does the gentleman think that a contract of that kind should be legalized and the Government compelled to take the land?

Mr. DENT. Well, I really did not catch the first part of the gentleman's question.

Mr. DILLON. The question is, Suppose an officer should make a loose contract with a landowner that the Government would buy his land for a certain purpose and should enter into possession of it and occupy it for a few days. Does the gentleman think that that contract should be legalized and compel the Government to take that land?

Mr. DENT. No; the contract would not be legalized. The gentleman does not catch the point. There is no legality, there is no validity, given to any of these contracts. It is simply intended to surmount the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury, so that the War Department can proceed to a settlement and an adjustment which will be recognized by the Comptroller but without recognizing the validity of the contract or giving the contractor the right to sue.

Mr. DILLON. Then would the gentleman say the Government should pay for the land under the circumstances I mentioned?

Mr. DENT. I do not know what the gentleman means by "loose" contract.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose he made a verbal contract.

Mr. DENT. If the Government did not get any benefit from it——

Mr. DILLON. But say the Government did.

Mr. DENT (continuing). And the contracting party did not suffer any liability or damages, then it would not be——

Mr. DILLON. But assuming the Government did enter into possession of it. Should not the damages be confined to the rentals rather than taking of the property?

Mr. DENT. Well, it would be confined to actual loss under this bill.

Mr. DILLON. I do not think so. Now, another question. I would like the gentleman to tell us what portion of contracts in Europe have been made by the English Government——

Mr. DENT. I can not tell.

Mr. DILLON. Acting for our Government and what the gentleman proposes to do with those governmental contracts?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman means the contracts made between this Government and the English Government?

Mr. DILLON. Where the English Government were acting for us through the English Government.

Mr. GORDON. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that it was testified before the committee that 90 per cent of the contracts this Government made with English manufacturers were made through the English Government, and if they were they would be subject to the English statute of fraud, which requires every such contract to be in writing and signed by the party to be charged.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose the English Government had a building in France for certain purposes and they should turn it over to the American Government. What would your bill do with that if they should prove an overcharge?

Mr. DENT. Well, of course, that is a matter of detail in the execution of it. If gentlemen are not willing to trust somebody to settle these things, of course we can not pass any legislation. Somebody must be trusted. You have to trust Gen. Pershing and his organization in France to carry out the obligations of the Government. You have got to trust the War Department to carry out the obligations which were made on this side, and if gentlemen are not willing to trust anybody, then let us not pass any legislation. So far as I am concerned, I think if we can safely trust a department to handle $15,000,000,000 which we have given them we can safely trust them to handle a billion and a half more.

And that is what is involved in this proposition. I was coming to that when I was interrupted. Here is a letter which I received from the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, and I will ask that the Clerk read it at the desk, in order to show what the facts and figures are.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 8, 1919.

Hon. S. HUBERT DENT, Jr.,
Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your request for certain information as to the obligations of the War Department incurred on formal and informal contracts, I beg to state that the total obligations and disbursements of the War Department during the war and up to December 1, 1918, in the United States were $15,381,125,058.59. This includes sums transferred to the American Expeditionary Forces, but does not include expenditures and obligations of the American Expeditionary Forces. Of this sum of disbursements and obligations of the War Department in the United States the sum of $9,757,228,468.46 was disbursed up to October 31, 1918. There remains the sum of $5,624,906,590.13 obligated on contracts formal and informal in this country, less November disbursements on the same. As of December 28 suspension in whole or in part had been directed on outstanding obligations in the United States in the sum of $5,078,259,724.39. A recent cable states that the outstanding obligations of the American Expeditionary Forces on November 11, 1918, amounted to $1,183,130,000; that $73,640,000 had been paid on account of these obligations up to December 10, 1918, and that notification of cancellation had at that time been given as to $350,663,000. The cable further states that there are certain classes of obligations that this statement does not cover.

The number of contracts as to which no question of validity has been raised has not yet been computed. The number of informal contracts in the United States is approximately 6,250. The amount of the uncompleted portion of these contracts is approximately $1,600,000,000. There are in addition a considerable number of outstanding contracts in certain of the bureaus not signed by the person named therein as contracting officer. These are now being computed. Practically none of the contracts entered into by the American Expeditionary Forces comply with the statutory requirements. The number of such contracts outstanding has been roughly estimated at 8,000.

Very truly, yours,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
Assistant Secretary of War,
Director of Munitions.

Mr. DENT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. From what the gentleman has said, I take it the claims can be separated into two classes, one class where the goods have been actually delivered and accepted by the Government and the other where no goods have been delivered and there is a claim for loss. Does not the gentleman believe that the wording of the bill, where he uses the words "expressed or implied," would permit a big class of people who manufacture goods on speculation, if you please, by conversations with officers, to construe by implication that if the war continued these goods would be bought? I have told manufacturers that "if they could get those motors out that we would buy them." Suppose a claim of that kind is presented. We have an implied contract there. We have an implication that we would purchase these goods. Would the gentleman consent to strike out the word "implied" in the bill?

Mr. DENT. I do not think that would make very much difference. But I do not agree to the gentleman's suggestion, as a legal proposition, that because some Army officers told a man, "If you will go and do something, something will happen," that that is an implied contract. An implied contract would arise where the terms had not been thoroughly agreed upon, but something had been done under it, although the exact terms had not been fixed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman would expect that he would require as much as to make the contract valid under the common law, under the statute of fraud? Would the gentleman so word his bill?

Mr. DENT. I think the bill is so worded now. As between private parties there can be a recovery under the same circumstances, and we are simply authorizing the Government to fulfill its obligations under such circumstances.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think there should be no doubt about it, and I think the bill should be made clear.

Mr. DENT. I am perfectly willing to accept any amendment that will make it any clearer.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact disclosed by the letter of the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Crowell, to show that under existing conditions and under a condition that existed prior to the armistice, and when war was going on, the Government had disbursed through the War Department $15,000,000,000 in order to carry on the war. Now, you propose, you gentlemen who are in favor of a commission, who are in favor of the so-called Senate bill, to make a distinction between the men who have $14,000,000,000 worth of contracts and will allow the War Department to proceed with their settlement, and you have allowed them to proceed with their settlement, but put a burden on the honest contractor who did not hire a lawyer and have a contract duly executed, and will force him to go through the process of hiring a lawyer and appearing before a commission.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that many of these did hire lawyers and the lawyers advised that they had better not have the affidavits made?

Mr. DENT. I have no information about inside facts. I believe, as a Member of Congress, that it is just as much our duty to see that Uncle Sam acts fairly and squarely as it is to see that he is not defrauded. [Applause.]

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Does the gentleman contend that an impartial judge would fail to do that?

Mr. DENT. Certainly I do not contend that.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Why does not the gentleman answer the question, then, as to why he objects to an impartial judge settling this, but desires to put it in the hands of the men who admit the irregularity?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman has got the notion in his head which has been in the heads of some others, and which I can not understand to save my life. It is true that I may be very obtuse on the subject, but I can not, to save my life, see that if you and I have an agreement and we get together and settle it, that that is a judicial question—that that is conferring judicial authority. I never have been able to get that proposition in my head, that it is a judicial question and conferring additional authority for us to settle a matter between ourselves.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I never contended that that was a judicial question; but there has been a question raised of irregularity. It is admitted by the War Department; and there have been other questions raised here, questions not only of irregularity, but questions of criminal action. That question has been raised here; and in view of the fact that it has been raised, as a Member of Congress I am called upon to say who is going to settle it. I would rather have somebody settle it who has not been under charges and against whom there is no implication made. That is my attitude; and as a Representative of my constituents and the taxpayers it is my duty to act upon it, and I will act upon it.

Mr. DENT. Of course, that is all right for the gentleman.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I am asking the chairman of the committee his opinion.

Mr. DENT. I have been trying to give my reasons for objecting to the commission. One reason I have just stated.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman from Alabama is fully able to take care of himself, and I wish simply, as a comrade on the committee, to attempt to supplement his observation made to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH]. There seems to be a curious misapprehension to the effect that all obligations, express and implied, up to the armistice were all right, but that the last ones, that were not finished and were not put into formal contracts, are tainted with fraud and therefore must now go to a commission.

Mr. DENT. That is so. That seems to be the distinction.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If a few days more had elapsed these very same contracts would have been completed to a formal state, and they would have been paid, and you would not have heard anything about them.

Mr. DENT. That is so.

Mr. LITTLE. Why does the gentleman say they had disposed of all these claims that accrued at the beginning of the war?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There are some technicalities there that do not involve questions of good faith at all, such as the simple formal irregularity of a signature; and the substitution of another man's signature would completely validate them.

Mr. LITTLE. Not the affidavit. If anybody will make the affidavit, I will do the rest myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, the Government was originally divided into three parts. I did not know which one of them the gentleman had got. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I recall that at the time of the declaration of war the newspapers had their columns filled with statements to the effect that the soldiers had no shoes and no clothing.

Mr. DENT. I do not want to yield for the gentleman to make a speech in my time.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I do not want to make a speech. I want to ask the gentleman if it was not physically impossible for the Secretary of War to sign all agreements, and therefore he was compelled to sign some agreements by telegraph? I am in favor of the gentleman's bill. In one instance in Philadelphia a firm received a telegram asking for 100,000 yards of cloth for the boys, just before the armistice was concluded. Does not the gentleman think that contract should be paid?

Mr. DENT. Yes. As the gentleman stated, it would have been a matter of physical impossibility for the contracting officer, the chief of the bureau, in the big program that we have here, to have personally signed every contract and made the affidavit. It would perhaps have been a physical impossibility.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. As a matter of fact, were not the contracts nearly always quite a way behind the orders for the goods?

Mr. DENT. Yes; that is true.

Mr. PLATT. And the manufacturers very often had to come down here to Washington and dig up the contracts?

Mr. DENT. Yes. And in that connection I want to call the attention of the committee to section 120 of the national-defense act, which in time of war or during imminence thereof gives the President the authority to make orders for war supplies, and requires the contractor to fill those orders, and makes it obligatory on him to give precedence to those orders over any other contracts he may have had before, and then gives the party the right to recover a fair and just value of the property that he delivered to the Government on the strength of that order. That is in the law passed in 1916, before we went into the war.

Mr. GORDON. That is still the law.

Mr. DENT. Yes; that is still the law; and the trouble about that is that there is no method provided by which the party who complied with the order can get his settlement made without going into the Court of Claims.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman inform the House as to whether any considerable number of these orders date back two or three or four or five or six or eight months? Are they not comparatively recent?

Mr. LITTLE. Are they not practically all after the 1st of July? A member of the committee told me so.

Mr. DENT. My recollection is that most of them did not run back beyond six months.

Mr. LITTLE. A member of the committee told me that they date mostly from the 1st of July.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Apropos to what the gentleman from Kansas says, it appears that the Engineer Corps during the war followed the practice that obtained in the Engineer Corps as to production before the war, and it went ahead in good faith and piled up a lot of contracts which were found subsequently to differ technically from the form of contracts by which the War Department generally was governed under the statutes. Therefore they were informal contracts, although they had been made in good faith and the memorandum of agreement had been written and was intended to be complied with.

Mr. DENT. I believe that is true, that they were following the rule of the Engineer Department.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not want to weary the chairman of the committee, but I have great confidence in him, and I want to get some information if I can. Is it not a fact that practically all of these claims are for what in the civil courts would be called unliquidated damages?

Mr. DENT. Oh, I do not agree to that at all.

Mr. LITTLE. I notice Mr. Warwick says that the agreements were not carried out.

Mr. DENT. I hope the gentleman will not take up my time.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Warwick intimates that it does not cover anything delivered.

Mr. DENT. I have stated already, as well as I could, what I thought it covered, and I would not like to repeat it, because I want to proceed further with the discussion of this question as to whether this should be done or we should relegate this to a commission or to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I want to ask the gentleman this question about this affidavit: Under the general law, if an Army officer should be personally interested in one of these contracts he would be liable to criminal prosecution just the same, would he not, whether he had signed the affidavit or not?

Mr. DENT. I do not think there can be any question about that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The failure to sign the affidavit would not relieve him from criminal responsibility.

Mr. DENT. Not at all. The bill expressly says that it shall not relieve him.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I know it is so in the event that that is the law.

Mr. DENT. I do not think there is any question in the world about it. If the gentleman will recall the conspiracy statute, covering conspiracies to defraud, it is about as broad a statute, I think, as I ever read in my life; and I am sure it would certainly cover a case where an Army officer and his subordinate deliberately entered into a scheme not to sign a contract in order to keep from making the oath. I do not think there would be any question in the world but what they would be guilty of a conspiracy to defraud the Government.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one more question along that line? He said the officer would be guilty under the conspiracy act. Suppose it should develop that the officer was really personally and financially interested in a contract without entering into any conspiracy, the contractor not knowing it and nobody else knowing it. Is there any statute that would cover that case and render the officer liable to criminal prosecution and punishment?

Mr. DENT. I am not able to put my finger on such a statute, but I am sure that such a statute as that exists. I am sure there must be a statute covering a case of that kind.

I have been asked the question why it is that we should allow the War Department to proceed to settle these matters as they have been allowed to settle the $15,000,000,000 worth of other contracts.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield right on that point? Does the gentleman think as a lawyer that where the War Department has terminated a contract it has a right to settle the unliquidated damages arising to the contractor out of that contract as a result of that termination?

Mr. DENT. Where the party——

Mr. GORDON. Where the Government has terminated a contract, just cut it off, as was done with thousands of contracts after the signing of the armistice. That, of course, would give rise to a claim for unliquidated damages, would it not?

Mr. DENT. It might.

Mr. GORDON. Is not the settlement of a claim for unliquidated damages the exercise of judicial power?

Mr. DENT. I do not think so.

Mr. GORDON. Then you and I do not agree about the law.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Ohio has had that notion in his mind all the way through. He is a good lawyer, but to save my life I can not see why parties can not agree together to settle their differences, and why that is a delegation of judicial authority.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would not the same power exist between private parties?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Private parties can do that, but the Government can not.

Mr. ROBBINS. Because this technical statute requires it to be in writing, you want to shut these people off.

Mr. GORDON. No; you do not understand the question at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. REED. A farmer from my State came to me three days ago in great trouble. He said the Government had taken some of his land, had fixed the price, and had told him: "Unless you take this price we will take it anyhow and condemn it." They entered upon the land, plowed it up, dug the surface away, put in great concrete foundations; and then came the armistice, and everything was called off. He came to me and said they would not recognize the agreement to purchase the land, and would not recognize any claim for damages. Does this bill reach that?

Mr. DENT. This bill would cover that kind of a case. It authorizes the Secretary of War to settle a case of that kind.

Now, I am opposed to the proposition authorizing a commission, because I believe that you ought not to make a discrimination between the honest contractor who did not get the regular legally executed contract and the man that did get one. That is the first thing. I think the War Department ought to be allowed to settle his contract just the same as the man who had a duly executed contract.

In the second place, I am opposed to it because I think it is straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel when gentlemen urge that there be a commission to settle claims amounting to $1,600,000,000, when the War Department has been allowed to settle fifteen billions of contracts. I think it is absurd. In the next place, the history of every commission that has ever been created in this country is that it is interminable, and you do not know when there will be a final disposition on the part of the commission. These are the three reasons why I am opposed to the commission idea.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Take the other end of it, take the case mentioned by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED], where his constituent had had his ground plowed up and went to the War Department and asked for justice, and they would not listen to him, would not do anything for him. If he has a just claim, if this bill passes he must go before that very officer who refused to do him justice. But if we had a commission he could submit his claim to the commission, and therefore he would have a better chance for justice being done.

Mr. DENT. The officer refused because he could not do anything. He could not do it unless this legislation passes. If it does pass, he has a right to go back to the officer, and he will see that justice is done. These are the reasons why I am in favor of this bill instead of a bill creating a commission.

Now, in conclusion—and I am going to reserve the balance of my time—I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this same proposition came up during the Civil War, and it is an interesting fact to know that during the Civil War, and in the midst of that war, charges were made against the Government, and language was used by the investigating committee by Members of the House against the War Department that would make the record now appear as praise.

I would like to call the attention to some of it, although I am not going into it at length. This is some of the language used in the report of the committee of Congress investigating war contracts in 1863:

> The mania for stealing seems to have run through all the relations of the Government—almost from the general to the drummer boy; from those nearest the throne of power to the nearest tidewaiter; nearly every man who deals with the Government seems to feel the desire that it would not long survive, and each had a common right to plunder while it lived.
> Colonels intrusted with the power of raising regiments colluding with contractors. * * * While it is no justification the example has been set in the very departments of the Government. As a general thing none but favorites gain access there.

That is the kind of language used during the Civil War about contracts made by the departments until a number of Members of Congress, including Mr. Conkling, called attention to the fact that these charges were absolutely hindering the Government in the prosecution of the war, and finally Congress adopted a bill which has just been called to my attention and is so much like this that had we seen it beforehand we might have been charged with having copied it.

I quote from Bolles's Financial History, page 240:

> Many claims, however, were irregular, and these rapidly multiplied during the war. The Court of Claims investigated and reported on a large number; Congress adjusted others; many were referred back by Congress to the departments with special authority for their adjustment. Thus in 1863 Congress authorized the Secretary of the Navy to adjust and settle the claims of contractors for those naval supplies which had been furnished during the preceding year that exceeded by more than 100 per cent the quantities specified in their contracts and without their default.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is, authorized the Secretary himself to settle it?

Mr. DENT. Yes; just like this does.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The Senate bill provides, as I understand it, for the payment for all supplies. It only refers to a commission in the case of unliquidated damages. It does not deal at all with any goods that have been delivered.

Mr. DENT. I do not so understand it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. DENT. To continue:

> The chief of any bureau with which any contract of the kind was made could associate with himself the chief of any other bureau to hear the evidence relating to it, but an appeal lay from his decision to the Secretary. The law also provided that no contractor should be allowed, except on the excess furnished by him, and on this "not more than sufficient to make the price thereon equal to the fair market value of the supplies at the time and place of delivery." Nothing, however, was to be allowed any contractor unless there had been an actual loss to him on the whole contract. He was, moreover, required to present his claim within six months from the enactment of the law or be forever barred from "any equitable claim" against the Government.

That was adopted on March 3, 1863, and by permission of the committee I insert at this point a copy of that bill, passed, as I say, in 1863, showing that we have a precedent for doing exactly what we have done:

[Mar. 3, 1863. No. 32.]

Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to adjust the equitable claims of contractors for naval supplies and regulating contracts with the Navy Department.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust and settle the claims of the contractors for naval supplies who during the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1862, have furnished to the department more than 100 per cent above the quantities specified in their contracts and without default therein; and for the purpose of hearing said claims may associate with the chief of the bureau with which the contract was made the chief of any other bureau, subject to an appeal to said Secretary from their decision: Provided, That no contractor shall be allowed, except upon the excess over the stipulated quantity and 100 per cent in addition thereto, and upon such excess not more than sufficient to make the price thereon equal to the fair market value of the supplies at the time and place of delivery; nor shall any contractor be allowed any amount under this section unless there has been an actual loss to the contractor upon the whole contract: And provided further, That all claimants under any such contracts shall present their claims to the department within six months after the passage of this joint resolution or be forever barred from any equitable claim on account of said contract.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the chief of any bureau of the Navy Department in contracting for naval supplies shall be at liberty to reject the offer of any person who, as principal or surety, has been a defaulter in any previous contract with the Navy Department; nor shall parties who have failed as principals or sureties in any former contract be received as sureties on other contracts; nor shall the copartners of any firm be received as sureties for such firm or for each other; nor, in contracts with the same bureau, shall one contractor be received as surety for another; and every contract shall require the delivery of a specified quantity, and no bids having nominal or fictitious prices shall be considered. That if more than one bid be offered by any one party, by or in the name of his or their clerk, partner, or other person, all such bids may be rejected; and no person shall be received as a contractor who is not a manufacturer of or regular dealer in the articles which he offers to supply, who has not a license as such manufacturer or dealer. And all persons offering bids shall have the right to be present when the bids are opened and inspect the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to release and discharge the penalties, or the provisions in the nature of penalties, in certain cases of unfulfilled contracts with the Bureau of Construction, and of provisions and clothing of the Navy Department, made by Nathaniel W. Coffin, William Lang, Henry Newton, Baxter & Summer, and Tilton, Wheelwright & Co., for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1862, made prior to the proclamation of the President establishing blockades of the southern ports, or to the several acts of Congress passed subsequent thereto, imposing additional duties upon domestic and foreign products, wherein, by reason of said acts and failure of the Government to pay according to the prescribed terms, parties have been obstructed and prevented from a proper fulfillment of the same, to the end that these accounts may be settled and adjusted on terms of equity and justice; and in the settlement of such accounts there shall be associated with the chief of the bureau in which the contract was made the chief of some other bureau of the Navy Department, and their decision shall be passed upon, modified, abridged, rejected, or approved by the Secretary of the Navy as, in his judgment, the law and justice shall require.

Approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman kindly state the volume from which he quotes?

Mr. DENT. I have been quoting from Bolles's Financial History of the United States. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

By unanimous consent Mr. DENT was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has consumed one hour. He has 30 minutes remaining, which time he has reserved.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. SNELL, to Mr. FESS, to Mr. LITTLE, and to Mr. FOSTER to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the indulgence of the House to permit him to revise and extend his ruling, if he sees fit to do so. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] that his only purpose is to answer the suggestion of the gentleman, which the Chair did not do, relative to the point of order being made in committee. The Chair can state now that, in his opinion, in the cases cited the House was in Committee of the Whole considering the Private Calendar, and when those bills were called up then the point of order was made, and it was the proper time to make it. The Chair simply wanted to put that reason in his ruling.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from Kansas is always glad to see any opinion of the Chair upon a parliamentary question inserted into the RECORD.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the senior member of the committee on this side, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am emphatically in favor of the payment of all just claims that have arisen during this war emergency, but I do not believe we should pass an omnibus bill validating more than 6,600 verbal contracts, if to provide for some good contracts we are to cover up loose contracts that ought to have the scrutiny of the representatives of the people. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to this bill proposing that the Secretary of War shall be joined in the oversight of these contract settlements by a congressional committee made up of two Senators and four Representatives—members of both parties.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield in five minutes.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to make a suggestion which, I think, would be of value.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That amendment will bring assurance not only to the Congress, which has been ignored in many things up to date during this war, but to the country that the Congress does exercise some oversight over the expenditure of public money; and in this instance the preliminary expenditure is to aggregate $1,600,000,000, or twice as much as is necessary to conduct the Government under normal conditions for two years.

Those who have awarded these contracts should not object to an audit by those who desire to be satisfied about the validity of them; but this bill as presented proposes to keep with those who made the awards the exclusive right to audit and settle. There is danger in that proposition, as I shall endeavor to show in the few minutes at my command.

This Congress without a dissenting vote passed an appropriation for $640,000,000 to build aircraft and put the country in position to assert itself in the war on the other side of the water. There was delay in completing the work, and, charges having been made that it had fallen down, the Senate appointed a committee to investigate. The committee presented a report to Congress, in which it said that as a result of the expenditure of this $640,000,000—

(b) We have not a single American-made chasse (or plane of attack) upon the battle front.

(c) We have not a single American-made heavy bombing plane upon the battle front.

Six hundred and forty million dollars gone, and a senatorial committee made the bald statement that we had not a single battle plane abroad to show for that vast expenditure! How was that tremendous sum of money spent? Who audited the accounts? Evidently the very officials who made the contracts. The War Department was assailed for our failure in aircraft, and charges were made to the President. In his own time the President started an investigation. He appointed former Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Hughes to make an inquiry. I have the Hughes report before me. It goes into the matter of culpability at some length, and has this to say concerning one Col. Edward A. Deeds:

2. The evidence discloses conduct which, although of a reprehensible character, can not be regarded as affording a sufficient basis for charges under existing statutes, but there are certain acts shown, not only highly improper in themselves but of especial significance, which should lead to disciplinary measures. The evidence with respect to Col. Edward A. Deeds should be presented to the Secretary of War to the end that Col. Deeds may be tried by court-martial under articles 95 and 96 of the Articles of War for his conduct (1) in acting as confidential adviser of his former business associate, H. E. Talbott, of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., and in conveying information to Mr. Talbott in an improper manner, with respect to the transaction of business between that company and the division of the Signal Corps of which Col. Deeds was the head; and (2) in giving to the representatives of the Committee on Public Information a false and misleading statement with respect to the progress of aircraft production for the purpose of publication with the authority of the Secretary of War.

3. The absence of proper appreciation of the obvious impropriety of transactions by the Government officers and agents with firms or corporations in which they are interested compels the conclusion that public policy demands that the statutory provisions bearing upon this conduct should be strictly enforced. It is therefore recommended that the officers found to have had transactions on behalf of the Government with corporations in the pecuniary profits of which they had an interest should be prosecuted under section 41 of the Criminal Code.

That report was made to the President of the United States, who is now abroad, October 25 last. Supporting that report of the Hughes investigation was a report by the Attorney General of the United States confirming it and suggesting that the War Department should proceed to court-martial Col. Deeds in accordance with the recommendation of Justice Hughes.

I quote from the Attorney General's report:

Of all the members of the aircraft boards, the one most severely criticized and against whom most charges have been brought has been Col. E. A. Deeds. The evidence does not disclose any violation by Col. Deeds of the criminal laws. In the early part of 1918 public statements were issued with official authority purporting to set out the progress which had then been made in the production of engines and planes and the prospects of the immediate future. These publications were not only misleading, but they contained false statements and were issued in reliance upon information principally furnished by Col. Deeds, who was acquainted with the actual facts. While the conduct of Col. Deeds in this matter was not criminal and can not be said to have affected actual production, it was inexcusable and reprehensible.

I also find that Col. Deeds was guilty of censurable conduct in acting as confidential adviser of H. E. Talbott and in conveying information to the latter with respect to transaction of business between the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. and the division of the Signal Corps of which Col. Deeds was the head.

Whether or not Col. Deeds should be subjected to disciplinary measures for the acts referred to is a matter to be determined by the War Department. I acquiesce in the recommendation of Judge Hughes that the facts be submitted to the Secretary of War.

President Wilson's Attorney General agreed with Justice Hughes that Col. Deeds should be court-martialed, and put the matter up to the War Department, the department that spent our $640,000,000 and did not give us a single fighting plane in France. And what did the War Department do? Court-martial Col. Deeds? Not yet. The War Department permitted Col. Deeds to spend a large part of that $640,000,000, and evidently it did not care to discredit the colonel's work. There is reason to believe it held the colonel in high esteem, notwithstanding the President's inquiry, the report of Justice Hughes, and the recommendation of the Attorney General. We obtain an inkling of the department's attitude in a report of a dinner given to Col. Deeds and reported in the Washington Star of December 21. All the official reports were in, but Col. Deeds had not yet been court-martialed. On the contrary, he was being dined and his praises were being sung by War Department officials, including the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, who is strongly advocating this bill to validate 6,600 oral contracts, and Gen. Squier, who is quoted as saying that the "irregular" things done by Col. Deeds were of considerable service in winning the war.

This "vote of confidence" on the part of those who might possibly be called upon to sit in judgment upon the colonel's alleged "irregularities," as reported by Justice Hughes, the President's investigator, and the Attorney General of the United States, induced him, according to the newspaper report, to rise and "address his associates," whereupon "he was applauded for several minutes." The $640,000,000 was no longer a matter of concern, for as the colonel stood waiting to speak "the assembly broke into song, declaring lustily that he was 'a jolly good fellow.'" It was at last the colonel's turn, and as placidly as though the Hughes report and that of the Attorney General had never been written, he proceeded to deal with what we might call "the tie that binds." In order that the newspaper report of the colonel's delicate dashes of sentiment may not be distorted, I quote it literally:

Col. Deeds said he hoped his friends, when they returned to private life, would show the unselfish devotion to humanity which characterized their conduct at Washington.

"But let us not in any way commercialize our experience here," said Col. Deeds. "It is quite enough that we have been able to be of some service to our country without advertising that fact. I hope that we will never read in a trade journal or any other newspaper any advertisement by any man who has worked here calling attention to what they did during the crisis through which we have just passed.

"It is too sacred a cause to be tainted by commercialism. Let us not forget that there is still work to do. We are going through a period of reconstruction when qualities which you have shown during the war will be in as great demand.

SPIRITUAL VALUE OF WAR.

"I am a little afraid that we will not get out of the war what France is getting out of it, what England is getting out of it, and what other nations allied with us are getting out of it. We, I fear, will not see and apply the spiritual value of the war."

Assistant Secretary Crowell, of the War Department; Admiral Taylor, representatives of the Italian and French missions, Lieut. Col. Horner, and Lieut. Col. Waldron, testified to the good qualities of Col. Deeds.

So it is seen that Col. Deeds, who was recommended for court-martial by rank outsiders, like Justice Hughes and the Attorney General, commends "his associates" for their splendid services. He was not court-martialed by them—or has not been so far, as we know—the expenditure of $640,000,000 for aircraft production to the contrary notwithstanding, and despite the fact that the Senate committee reported not a single American fighting plane in France.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Chairman, is it not wise to aid the Secretary of War with a little congressional oversight in relation to these 6,600 oral contracts, for more than $1,600,000,000, which we are asked to validate?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). Unless we do cooperate with him, I fear we "will not see and apply the spiritual value of the war."

I wanted attention called to this matter, Mr. Chairman, so that in discussing the proposition to-morrow we may determine whether we shall have an amendment for some congressional supervision of these expenditures. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 13274, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution adopted by some Jewish citizens of Cleveland on the Poland situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing some resolutions adopted by some citizens of Cleveland on the Poland situation. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating remarks delivered during the last session of Congress, and which I failed to incorporate in the RECORD then.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. LONDON. My own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by incorporating his own remarks therein. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the life of Col. Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the life of Col. Roosevelt. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that the membership of the House is giving close consideration to the measure under consideration, and if we meet at 11 o'clock with only a handful of Members it might provoke the point of no quorum, and we would not get very far. There is a large number of committees now meeting. I do not think we would get very far by the House meeting at 11 o'clock. Therefore I object.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to state to the House and to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] will try his best to finish his bill to-morrow, even if we have to stay here until 8 or 9 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are but two hours left for general debate.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not going to insist on the request, but I am going to give notice that we will try to finish the bill to-morrow, even if we stay until 9 o'clock. It is getting so late in the session now that we must use considerable time. We can not rise at 5 or half past 5 each night, but most of the time we will have to stay until 8 o'clock in order to get the appropriation bills to the Senate in time for action there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in order to permit me to direct an inquiry to the gentleman from Alabama?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] object?

Mr. STAFFORD. I did object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the end of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman may proceed for two minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that I am in thorough accord with what he says about expediting matters. It is absolutely sure that if we do not pass the appropriation bills an extra session of Congress will be forced. And it seems to me the condition of the calendar would warrant the Committee on Rules bringing in a rule changing the regular meeting hour of this House from 12 oclock noon until 11 a. m.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the membership of the House would have notice of the meeting, whereas under the present exigency we would have only a corporal's guard here to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and some Member might make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CRISP. I am not making any criticism of the gentleman's course.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to see that the chairmen of the committees hereafter pursue the policy, and I think the Members on both sides will agree, of getting through with the bills and finishing them, if it takes until 8, 9, or even 11 o'clock, because we must get these appropriation bills over to the Senate by at least the 15th of February, in order to give the Senate time to consider them. And they can not do this unless we take the extra time here. Members are in the habit of getting up and saying that it is time to rise, and that they will make the point of no quorum unless we will do so. But we will stay here if we have to stay until 11 o'clock, so that the House can pass the bills.

Mr. ROBBINS. Are there any bills now ready to report?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; bills are ready. The diplomatic bill is ready and the Indian Affairs will be ready in a few days.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will not insist on the request. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 9, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a statement showing the names of employees of the Department of Agriculture for whom requests for exemption or deferred classification have been asked and allowed (H. Doc. No. 1661); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department for protecting timber on the Oregon & California Railroad lands and Coos Bay wagon-road lands from fire, for the fiscal years 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1662); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of State relative to housing American diplomatic representatives abroad (H. Doc. No. 1663); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Chattahoochee River, Ga. and Ala. (H. Doc. No. 1664); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

5. A letter from the vice president of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator & Railway Co., transmitting annual report for the year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1665); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules of papers not needed in the transaction of business and of no permanent value or historical interest (H. Doc. No. 1666); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SINNOTT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10394) to add certain lands to the Minam National Forest, Oreg., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 898), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Miss RANKIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 940) to provide for the payment for certain lands within the former Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 900), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

She also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 932) to provide for stock-watering privileges on certain unallotted lands on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 901), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLAND of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 13821) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Phoebus, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13822) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Hampton, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13823) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Fredericksburg, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13824) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Newport News, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13825) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Parksley, county of Accomac, State of Virginia, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13826) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Onancock, county of Accomac, State of Virginia, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13827) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Cape Charles, county of Northampton, State of Virginia, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13828) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Chincoteague, county of Accomac, State of Virginia, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13829) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Yorktown, county of York, State of Virginia, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13830) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Essex, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13831) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Warwick, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13832) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Westmoreland, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13833) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Mathews, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13834) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of King and Queen, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13835) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Middlesex, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13836) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Caroline, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13837) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Northampton, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13838) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Northumberland, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13839) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Richmond, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13840) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Lancaster, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13841) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Gloucester, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13842) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Accomac, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13843) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the county of Spotsylvania, Va., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 9, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee to worship Thee and seek Thy blessing and Thy guidance. Thou hast dealt with us very graciously. Thou hast led us by the hand. Thou hast manifested Thyself to us in plans, purposes, ideals, and achievements that are wonderful to contemplate. We put ourselves in Thy hands to follow the divine guidance, working out all Thy great plans for us. We pray that we may be willing and obedient servants of Thine own majesty. For Christ's sake. Amen.

JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr., a Senator from the State of New York, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last, when, on request of Mr. SHEPPARD and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules and lists of papers, forms, and so forth, not needed and of no historical value, and asking for action looking to their disposition. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] as the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives thereof.

COST OF THE WAR (S. DOC. NO. 329).

EMPLOYEES IN INTERIOR DEPARTMENT (S. DOC. NO. 330).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees in the department January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EMPLOYEES OF SHIPPING BOARD (S. DOC. NO. 333).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees of the board January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EMPLOYEES OF FOOD ADMINISTRATION (S. DOC. NO. 332).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the United States Food Administrator, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 23, 1918, a list showing the number of civil employees in the Food Administration January 1, 1919, and the number discharged during the previous two weeks, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representaives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4246. An act to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Connecticut;

H. R. 5989. An act to grant certain lands to the town of Olathe, Colo., for the protection of its water supply;

H. R. 8625. An act to accept from the Southern Oregon Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, a reconveyance of the lands granted to the State of Oregon by the act approved March 3, 1869, entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos Bay to Roseburg, in said State," commonly known as the Coos Bay wagon-road grant, to provide for the dispositon of said lands, and for other purposes;

H. R. 12210. An act to amend the act of May 14, 1898, as amended by the act of March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to extend the homestead laws and to regulate the sale and entry of public lands along the shore of navigable waters in Alaska";

H. R. 12579. An act to grant to citizens of Malheur County, Oreg., the right to cut timber in the State of Idaho for agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, and to remove such timber to Malheur County, Oreg.;

H. R. 12881. An act to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans.;

H. R. 13042. An act providing for the extension of time for the reclamation of certain lands in the State of Oregon under the Carey Act; and

H. R. 13306. An act to authorize the payment of allotments out of the pay of enlisted men in certain cases in which these payments have been discontinued.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MOSES presented a resolution adopted by the Central Labor Union of Portsmouth, N. H., favoring the extension of Federal control of railroads, express companies, and telephone and telegraph lines, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Council No. 195, United Commercial Travelers of America, of Manchester, N. H., praying for the return to private ownership of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FERNALD. I send to the desk a resolution adopted by Local Council No. 103, United Commercial Travelers of America, at a meeting held at Portland, Me. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTLAND COUNCIL NO. 103,
UNITED COMMERCIAL TRAVELERS OF AMERICA,
Portland, Me., January 6, 1919.

Hon. B. M. FERNALD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the regular meeting of Portland Council of the United Commercial Travelers of America, held Saturday night, January 4, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas the emergency that existed making it necessary for the United States Government to take over the railroads of this country has ceased, and believing from our judgment founded on years of travel as commercial men that the people and business interests can be best served by private ownership, we ask that you, as our representative in Congress, use your best efforts to have the roads returned to their original owners under such restrictions as will be liberal and fair to them and just to the people whom they serve and whose servants they are."

A. M. MENISH, Secretary.

Mr. FERNALD. I also present a resolution adopted by Lithuanians at a mass meeting in Lewiston, Me., which I ask be placed in the RECORD without reading and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEWISTON, ME.

Senator BERT M. FERNALD,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

A protest resolution voted upon by the Lithuanians at a mass meeting, all parties being represented, held January 5, 1919, in Lithuanian Hall, No. 133 Lisbon Street, Lewiston, Me.

We, the Lithuanians of Lewiston and vicinity, hearing that the Polish Army threatens to take Vilna, the capital of Lithuania, met in Lithuanian Hall, January 5, 1919, and decided that:

Whereas Lithuania, since prehistoric times, embraces the Baltic coast as a separate country and nation, whose language and customs have nothing in common with those of Poland;

Whereas Lithuania having been for a long time an independent nationality and since 1772, when Russia and Germany enslaved her, Lithuanians have not ceased to fight for their rights;

And whereas this war was waged for the freeing of all nations;

Therefore a great wrong would be done to the people of Lithuania if some other foreign nation would be permitted to thrust itself into Lithuania.

Protesting against the imperialistic steps of the Poles, we beseech the United States to use its influence so that this attempt of Lithuania's adversary be checked, and the Lithuanians be permitted to have their own government. We further ask the United States Government, which so generously aids other war-suffering nations, to lend a hand in behalf of the starving people of Lithuania.

LOUIS BANIULIS,
Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions.

Mr. KNOX presented resolutions adopted by the Philadelphia Bourse of Pennsylvania and resolutions adopted by the Maritime Exchange, of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the enactment of legislation for the development of the American merchant marine, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Harrisburg, Pa., and a petition of the Home Missionary Society of Nanticoke, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the allied Irish-American Societies of Pittsburgh, Pa., and a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of sundry citizens of Sharon, Pa., in favor of freedom for Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Beaver Valley Lodge No. 607, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, of Rochester, Pa., praying for the extension of Federal control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry Lithuanian citizens of Lewiston, Me., praying for the independence of Lithuania, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Council No. 108, United Commercial Travelers of America, of Portland, Me., praying for the return to private ownership of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5191) for the relief of private owners of lands within or near the Bitter Root, Lolo, or Missoula National Forests, Mont., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 639) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report certain amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 5261) to legalize informal or defective orders for war supplies and materials, to provide for the cancellation of orders and contracts, for the reimbursement of contractors or manufacturers, for the adjustment of claims on canceled or partially filled contracts and orders, and to provide relief for contractors pending final determination, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MEDALS FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12194) to provide for the award of medals of honor, distinguished-service medals, and Navy crosses, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 638) thereon. This is a bill providing for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals for those in the Navy. A bill similar to this providing for medals for the Army was passed last July, but no bill of this character has been passed for the Navy. It is very urgent that it should be passed as early as possible, as a great many of the officers and men of the Navy are being demobilized, and these honors may be properly conferred now, when it can be done more efficiently. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to present, in the name of Congress, a medal of honor to any person who, while in the naval service of the United States, shall, in action involving actual conflict with the enemy, distinguish himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty and without detriment to the mission of his command or the command to which attached.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a distinguished-service medal of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with a rosette or other device to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while in the naval service of the United States, since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who hereafter shall distinguish himself by exceptionally meritorious service to the Government in a duty of great responsibility.

SEC. 3. That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a Navy cross of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with a rosette or other device to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while in the naval service of the United States, since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who shall hereafter distinguish, himself by extraordinary heroism or distinguished service in the line of his profession, such heroism or service not being sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor or a distinguished-service medal.

SEC. 4. That each enlisted or enrolled person of the naval service to whom is awarded a medal of honor, distinguished-service medal, or a Navy cross shall, for each such award, be entitled to additional pay at the rate of $2 per month from the date of the distinguished act or service on which the award is based, and each bar or other suitable emblem or insignia in lieu of a medal of honor, distinguished-service medal, or Navy cross, as hereinafter provided for, shall entitle him to further additional pay at the rate of $2 per month from the date of the distinguished act or service for which the bar is awarded, and such additional pay shall continue throughout his active service, whether such service shall or shall not be continuous.

SEC. 5. That no more than one medal of honor or one distinguished-service medal or one Navy cross shall be issued to any one person; but for each succeeding deed or service sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor or a distinguished-service medal or Navy cross, respectively, the President may award a suitable bar or other suitable emblem or insignia to be worn with the decoration and the corresponding rosette or other device.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to expend from the appropriation "Pay of the Navy" of the Navy Department so much as may be necessary to defray the cost of the medals of honor, distinguished service medals, and Navy crosses, and bars, emblems, or insignia herein provided for, and so much as may be necessary to replace any medals, crosses, bars, emblems, or insignia as are herein or may heretofore have been provided for: Provided, That such replacement shall be made only in those cases where the medal of honor, distinguished-service medal, or Navy cross, or bar, emblem, or insignia presented under the provisions of this or any other act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was awarded, and shall be made without charge therefor.

SEC. 7. That, except as otherwise prescribed herein, no medal of honor, distinguished-service medal, Navy cross, or bar or other suitable emblem or insignia in lieu of either of said medals or of said cross shall be issued to any person after more than five years from the date of the act or service justifying the award thereof, nor unless a specific statement or report distinctly setting forth the act or distinguished service and suggesting or recommending official recognition thereof shall have been made by his naval superior through official channels at the time of the act or service or within three years thereafter.

SEC. 8. That in case an individual who shall distinguish himself dies before the making of the award to which he may be entitled the award may nevertheless be made and the medal or cross or the bar or other emblem or insignia presented within five years from the date of the act or service justifying the award thereof to such representative of the deceased as the President may designate: Provided, That no medal or cross or no bar or other emblem or insignia shall be awarded or presented to any individual or to the representative of any individual whose entire service subsequent to the time he distinguished himself shall not have been honorable: Provided further, That in cases of persons now in the naval service for whom the award of the medal of honor has been recommended in full compliance with then existing regulations, but on account of services which, though insufficient fully to justify the award of the medal of honor, appear to have been such as to justify the award of the distinguished-service medal or Navy cross hereinbefore provided for, such cases may be considered and acted upon under the provisions of this act authorizing the award of the distinguished-service medal and Navy cross, notwithstanding that said services may have been rendered more than five years before said cases shall have been considered as authorized by this proviso, but all consideration or any action upon any of said cases shall be based exclusively upon official records now on file in the Navy Department.

SEC. 9. That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to delegate, under such conditions, regulations, and limitations as he shall prescribe, to flag officers who are commanders in chief or commanding on important independent duty the power conferred upon him by this act to award the Navy cross; and he is further authorized to make from time to time any and all rules, regulations, and orders which he shall deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act and to execute the full purpose and intention thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice that the bill provides for some increase of pay. Was there a corresponding provision in the military act?

Mr. SWANSON. I understand there is practically the same provision in both the military and naval bills for the increase of pay of enlisted men who receive the medals.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not remember that there was any increased pay provided for those in the Army.

Mr. SWANSON. I inquired at the Navy Department, and they assured me that it is true.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If this corresponds with the military bill, I do not object.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand it does. I did not look up the matter specifically myself, but I made inquiry at the Bureau of Navigation, that had charge of the preparation of the bill, and they stated that there was practically the same increase allowed in the Army.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator says "practically the same." Is it the same or is there a difference?

Mr. SWANSON. There is a little difference in pay between the Army and Navy.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I have in mind is that this bill provides for the payment of $2 a month additional.

Mr. SWANSON. Two dollars, and I understand in the Army the enlisted men get $2.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I wanted to know. I have no objection then to the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs why the first section of the bill is different in language from the following section in that it provides for men in future and not those who have already distinguished themselves in action.

Mr. SWANSON. The other sections of the bill provide that these medals shall be bestowed upon anyone who has done service that justify the awarding of the medal since the 6th of April, 1916, since the declaration of war was made. Outside of the congressional medals I understand that there is a law authorizing the awarding of medals and crosses. The other section of the bill as passed by the House authorizes these medals to be awarded in the future to anyone in actual service subsequent to the 6th of April, 1916.

Mr. KIRBY. I did not hear the bill read and I do not know anything about it. Does it only provide for the awarding of medals. Is that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. SWANSON. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. KIRBY. It does not increase the rank of anyone?

Mr. SWANSON. It does not increase the rank of anyone.

Mr. KIRBY. Nor the pay of anyone in the Navy?

Mr. SWANSON. No; except that the enlisted men who get these medals awarded have an increase of $2 a month in their pay.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 208) providing that one term of the United States district court for the eastern judicial district of Oklahoma shall be held annually at Hugo, Okla. I ask the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the joint resolution.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It is purely a local matter.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That one term of the United States district court for the eastern district of Oklahoma shall be held each year on the second Monday in May at Hugo, in said State and district, and all acts and parts of acts not in accordance herewith are hereby modified in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, referring to the bill (H. R. 79) for the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain in Minnesota, which I explained to the Senate the other day, I desire to say that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] then desired time to look into the bill. I understand he has stated that he has now no objection to the bill. A bill similar to this once passed the Senate, and the bill for which I now ask consideration has passed the House. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be brought before the Senate for consideration and passage at this time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I have examined the bill, and, as it only affects a few isolated tracts of land in the State of Minnesota, I have no objection to its consideration and passage at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Minnesota that the bill has not been reported to the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. I introduced such a bill the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but the bill is at present in the hands of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I shall have to secure a report from that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota can move to discharge the Committee on Public Lands from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it may now be considered by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 79) for the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain in Minnesota.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota state what reason there is why the Committee on Public Lands should be discharged from the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Committee on Public Lands has considered a bill exactly like this one and has reported it favorably. That bill passed the Senate; but instead of the other House taking up the particular bill which passed the Senate, it took up the House bill, passed it, and sent it over here. The two bills are identical, and I simply ask that this bill be taken up and passed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there has been so much noise in the Chamber that I could not hear the statement of the Senator from Minnesota. I will ask the Senator to again state his request.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to state, in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Montana, that the Committee on Public Lands once considered a bill similar to the one for which I now ask consideration, and recommended its passage. The bill simply provides for the application of the general statute providing for the sale of isolated tracts of an Indian reservation of the Chippewas in the State of Minnesota, the sale of such lands having been heretofore provided for by other laws.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator for his explanation.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I have stated, the Senate has passed a similar bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Public Lands is discharged from the further consideration of the bill and the question is, on the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], for unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act of March 28, 1912 (37 Stat. L., 77), relating to the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain, be, and the same are hereby, extended and made applicable to ceded Chippewa Indian lands in the State of Minnesota: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to lands which are not subject to homestead entry: Provided further, That purchasers of land under this act must pay for the lands not less than the price fixed in the law opening the lands to homestead entry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN MISSOULA COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. MYERS. I report from the Committee on Public Lands favorably and without amendment the bill (H. R. 9865) to authorize the sale of certain lands to school district No. 28 of Missoula County, Mont., and I submit a report (No. 637) thereon.

I desire to say a few words in explanation of the bill. The bill has passed the House and has come over to the Senate and is now favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands. The act opening the Flathead Reservation in Montana provided for the sale of a 10-acre tract of land to the town of Ronan, Mont., for school purposes, at not less than the appraised value, the funds to go to the Flathead Indians. The town of Ronan, however, is not the proper entity to which to convey the land. The conveyance should be to school district No. 28, of Missoula County, Mont., which should be the holder of title to the land. Under the laws of the State of Montana, the conveyance should be made to the school district. It is the district in which the town of Ronan is situate, but towns do not own land for school purposes in my State. This bill is merely to correct that error and to substitute school district No. 28, of Missoula County, Mont., for the town of Ronan. It will enable the 10-acre tract of land to be sold by the Secretary of the Interior, at not less than the appraised value, to school district No. 28, of Missoula County, Mont. The Interior Department urges that it be done. As I have already stated, the money is to go to the Indians, and Indian children are permitted to attend the school. So there is no objection whatever to the legislation. The Interior Department urges that the legislation be enacted promptly. In fact, a school building has already been erected on the land, on the supposition that the title to it would be made all right. I therefore report the bill and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell and convey to school district No. 28, of Missoula County, Mont., the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 36, township 21 north, range 20 west, on the Flathead Indian Reservation, in Montana, or so much thereof as may be required, for public-school purposes, under such terms and regulations as he may prescribe, at not less than its appraised value; and the net proceeds from the sale of said land shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Flathead Indians, to draw interest at the rate now provided by law, and to be used for the benefit of the Indians on the Flathead Indian Reservation: Provided, That the patent therefor shall contain the condition that Indian children residing in the said school district No. 28 shall at all times be admitted to the privilege of attendance and instruction on equality with white children.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I report favorably, with amendments, from the Committee on Banking and Currency the bill (S. 5236) to amend sections 7, 10, and 11 of the Federal reserve act, and section 5172, Revised Statutes of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 636) thereon.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, the passage of which is urgently requested by the Federal Reserve Board. The committee has stricken from the bill some of the provisions which were asked for, so that the bill now only contains provisions which cover the following purposes:

First, to permit the Federal reserve banks to use their earnings and to increase their surplus until the surplus amounts to 100 per cent. The present law limits the surplus to 40 per cent, and that amount has almost been already reached.

The reason for desiring that the surplus may be increased is that the deposits of these banks have grown very largely, and also the note issues of the banks have grown, on account of the war very much beyond what had been anticipated, so that at the present time the Federal reserve banks of the United States have capital and surplus amounting only to 2 per cent of their total liabilities. This condition places them in an awkward position, particularly so far as any foreign relations are concerned. For instance, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York City has a capital of only $20,000,000. I do not remember exactly what its surplus amounts to, but it may amount to four million or five million dollars. It has, however, a capital of only twenty million. It has obligations greater than has the Bank of England, and yet the Bank of England has four times the capital of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York City. Therefore the Federal Reserve Board desires that these banks may be allowed to use surplus earnings year by year, including the year 1918 just passed—and that is the urgency of it—until the surplus aggregates 100 per cent.

I wish to say further that under the present law the surplus earnings, after the payment of 6 per cent dividends, are divided into two parts—one-half goes to creating additional surplus, which, however, is limited to 40 per cent, and the other part goes into the Treasury of the United States as a franchise tax, where it is used as a special fund either for the purchase of bonds or as a redemption fund for notes. It is an unimportant and unnecessary disposition of the money for that purpose, but if we are to have the Federal Reserve Banking System strong and to compare with the other great reserve banks of the world we certainly want a capital and surplus greater than 2 per cent.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I think it was understood that the third provision had relation to the engraving of signatures on notes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am coming to that presently, if the Senator will wait.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well; but while I am on my feet, I wish to ask the Senator, who is acting chairman of the committee, if he is quite sure that the only change that this provision makes in existing law relates simply to the engraving of signatures on the notes? There was some question in regard to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can take that matter up now. The committee in ordering the report of the bill qualified it by saying that, as acting chairman of the committee, I must first assure myself that the third provision, which I have not read yet, related only to authorizing the use of engraved signatures and did not include anything else. That section is a reenactment of existing law, but the committee was not able to follow it out to the full extent. I telephoned to Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, and asked him for a written statement on that point. I received his reply this morning—my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who raised the point, has the letter—a reading of which convinces me that the provision changes the law in no respect except authorizing the engraving of the signatures on the notes instead of the names being signed, and it omits the authorization for $3 notes from the law, that provision being a dead letter. The Senator can see that letter if he so desires.

The other provision, which the committee reports favorably, provides for enlarging the amount of notes of any one customer that a Federal reserve bank can discount for a member bank. As the law is now a Federal reserve bank can only discount for a member bank notes of an individual customer of the member bank to the extent of 10 per cent of its capital and surplus; that is, if John Smith goes to a member bank, say a State bank, and discounts notes or borrows money to the extent of 20 per cent of the capital and surplus of the bank, that bank can only use one-half of those notes at the Federal reserve bank. This provision authorizes the Federal Reserve Board from time to time, by a general ruling covering all the districts, to permit the Federal reserve banks to discount for any member bank notes to the extent of 20 per cent of their capital and surplus for any one customer, provided United States bonds, in addition to the other securities, are deposited with the notes and bills so discounted.

The purpose of this is double—to facilitate the discount of notes and to afford an additional use for United States securities. The committee, on the motion, I think, of my colleague from Nebraska, struck out the provision which limited those securities to United States bonds issued during the recent war and provided that any United States bonds might be used as such security.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. This seems to be another step in the program of inflation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, I doubt that. I think it gives additional value to United States bonds. Where men have purchased in the stress of the war more bonds than they really were able to buy, it enables them to borrow money at their own banks, and it permits home banks to use those bonds as security if they wish to discount notes at the Federal reserve banks. It can only be done, however, in those cases where the Federal reserve bank authorizes it for all of the districts of the country.

I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I have stood strenuously in the committee against the repeated attempts that have been made to remove that limitation on borrowing. I believe that the banks ought not to be allowed to increase the amount of money they can loan to any one customer; but we have taken into the system a great many State banks, and under the State laws those banks are authorized in many cases to loan 20 per cent of their capital and surplus to a single customer on certain classes of security. So I yielded my judgment on this provision, and think no harm can come from it. It is in the direction of extending the credit of the Government; it is in the direction of maintaining the value of the liberty bonds that the people have in many cases been forced to buy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there may be a few States in the Union that authorize the loaning of 20 per cent of the capital and surplus of a bank to one individual, but I can not recall a State that authorizes it. Generally the limit is 10 per cent, although in many cases it is 15 per cent, but 15 per cent is always considered rather extravagant.

Under this provision we authorize 20 per cent of the capital and surplus of a bank to be loaned to a single individual and the Federal Reserve Board to issue notes on the full face value, provided there are United States bonds back of them. States requiring by law that no larger amount than 10 per cent of capital and surplus shall be loaned to an individual can receive no benefit under this provision, if it should pass. It seems to me that it will simply give to a State that has authorized a loan amounting to 20 per cent of the capital and surplus to one individual an advantage over the State which has been conservative in the past in holding down extremely large loans to single individuals. On the face of it, Mr. President, I do not like it. There may be some special reason for it about which I am not informed, but I wish to say to the Senator now that from a casual reading of the bill I think it is very poor banking policy.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, referring to the amount which the banks may loan upon the security of Government bonds, my understanding is that in all the debates and discussions we have had in the last few months in regard to this matter we have stated that we wished to uphold and strengthen the position of the liberty bonds. Now, whether that is so or not may be a matter of debate. I am willing, however, to vote to allow banks in the Federal Reserve System to loan 20 per cent of their capital and surplus on liberty bonds. We must understand that to-day 2 per cent bonds, under the advantages given them, sell at 98 cents on the dollar, almost par, while poor people who have been urged to buy liberty bonds are compelled to accept 94, 96, and 98 cents on the dollar. I sincerely believe that we ought not to increase the amount which may be loaned on bonds by the amendment on lines 16, 17, 18, and 19 on page 3. I should like to have the Senator give me some information on that point.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, of course my request now is only for unanimous consent to consider the bill. When consent is given, it will be for the Senate to decide whether it will strike out that portion which is recommended by the committee giving preference to liberty bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Vermont, I am afraid, will be misunderstood. This provision is not to enable loans to be made upon liberty bonds, but to enable loans to be made upon the paper of an individual who may borrow from the banks with an amount of liberty bonds to the face of the loan as security. That is what this provision is for. It is not a loan upon liberty bonds at all.

What I object to is this: I believe it is unwise and unsafe banking to allow banks in the United States to loan 20 per cent of their capital and surplus to any one individual or any one corporation. I make that as a broad statement, and I believe it is unsound to establish that principle. I think 10 per cent is safe, and in certain cases I am perfectly willing to say that it might be 15 per cent, just as many of the State laws have provided; but when it comes to saying that 20 per cent, one-fifth of all the capital and all the surplus of a bank, can be loaned to one individual, I say it is a poor business policy.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to have the Senator leave us clear about this matter. He says that under this provision 20 per cent of a bank's capital and surplus can be loaned to one individual.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. I do not understand that this percentage may be loaned to anyone except on security of Government bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Back of the loan that is made by the bank there are to be these liberty bonds, or under the provisions of this bill any other United States bonds can be held by the Federal Reserve Board as security for the payment of the loan. That is all this bill provides.

Mr. PAGE. But it really means that we are loaning on Government bonds, does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President; we are virtually loaning to the bank. The transaction has to originate in the bank, and then the bank must have a similar amount in liberty bonds as additional security. That is all there is to it. It is authorizing the bonds to be deposited as security for the loan.

Mr. PAGE. But it is really an inhibition against loaning money to anybody up to the amount of 20 per cent unless there are Government bonds behind the transaction.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I think the Federal Reserve Board will see to that. I am not objecting to that. I think these bonds are the very best security. There could not be better security. What I am objecting to is the unsound business policy of allowing a bank to loan one-fifth of its capital and surplus to one individual.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator by whom this legislation is recommended. Is it recommended by the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is recommended by the Federal Reserve Board, and it is rather an urgent matter, not only because they want to have it apply to the surplus which has been accumulated during the year 1918 but because they want to give relief to those people who, under stress of great agitation, have gone to their banks and borrowed money to purchase United States liberty bonds. They do not want those people compelled to throw those bonds upon the market and sell them. They want to permit them, under regulations of the board, to use them as security for maintaining their loans.

Mr. SWANSON. Is any limit contained in the bill as to the time in which this can be done? Is any limited number of years prescribed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; but it is provided that upon the affirmative vote of not less than five of its members the Federal Reserve Board shall have power from time to time, by general ruling covering all districts alike, "to permit Federal reserve banks to discount for any member bank," and so forth. It is a temporary matter, to be used when it is necessary to relieve the country on account of the purchase of these bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say this further to the Senator: This would never affect an individual who had not bought more bonds than one-fifth of the capital and surplus of the bank upon which the loan could be made; and, Mr. President, the policy has always been for a bank to accommodate not merely one person in the community in which it is located, but to accommodate all of the people in that community, and therefore the law has justly held that it was unwise to allow a bank to loan more than 10 per cent of its capital and surplus to any one person. As I said, however, in some instances the limit has reached as high as 15 per cent. That is the principle involved in this proposition that I do not like.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What the Senator from Virginia says is very true. It is only intended as a temporary expedient from time to time, when by the affirmative vote of five members of the board it is deemed desirable to do it. It will only be a temporary matter.

Mr. SWANSON. At the present time, when people all over the country have bought bonds with the understanding that their loans would be renewed by the banks two or three times before payment would be required—and, of course, they made the purchases largely on borrowed money, and a great many of these notes were discounted by the Federal reserve banks—I can see where there is necessity for legislation to prevent people who thus bought bonds from having to sacrifice them; but it does seem to me to be inconsistent with the principles of sane banking to allow for a long time to come—for years to come—big borrowers to get 20 per cent of all the capital and surplus of a bank; to allow, for years and years to come, big borrowers to absorb all the money in the market and let the small manufacturers and merchants and people conducting other enterprises be debarred from borrowing. That is legislation that I think ought to be avoided.

It seems to me that if we should limit this to a certain length of time, so as to get rid of the present conditions in connection with the sale of liberty bonds, it would be wise; but to have a law passed under which for all time five or six big borrowers in any community can take the resources of a bank and absorb them and small borrowers will have no opportunity to go there and get their notes discounted would be unwise legislation. It seems to me that the committee ought to limit this to meet the present emergency.

One of the great advantages of the Federal Reserve System to the entire country was the fact that it limited loans to 10 per cent. Nobody could get in excess of 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of a bank; so the money was in the bank, and small manufacturers and merchants and the masses of the people, this fund being unabsorbed by large borrowers, were able to get bank accommodations. I can see that the Senator is right in saying that something ought to be done to relieve this emergency; but I should like to see the legislation limited to a certain number of years during which this privilege can be extended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Personally I am disposed to agree with that view of the case. I will say to the Senator that I have made, not once but repeatedly, fights in the committee to oppose the modification of the law limiting individual loans to 10 per cent; and personally I should be glad to support the proposition of a three-year limit.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this provision is going to apply to only a very few people in the United States. If a bank's capital and surplus is a million dollars, 20 per cent of that is $200,000. Fifteen per cent, under the laws of the States now, is $150,000; and there are very few people in the United States who have bought $150,000 worth of liberty bonds and borrowed money to carry them.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this emergency has arisen: A manufacturer or a merchant needs so much money to conduct his business. Heretofore he has been doing it under the 10 per cent limitation of the Federal reserve act. But these manufacturers and merchants and people who have bought these bonds not only have to take care of their business now, but they have to take care of the bonds until they can be paid for. Consequently under those circumstances they might need 20 per cent now to take care of their business and to prevent the sale of these bonds. It seems to me that if we should limit this provision to two years or three years we would get rid of this emergency, and we would not have a law here that could be used for the next 20 years to give the entire resources of a bank into the hands of a few of these big borrowers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Senator if he will not allow this bill to go over. If it is absolutely necessary to have legislation of this kind I am not going to object; but I really believe it would be better for the United States, in the few cases that will be affected by this bill, to compel the borrowers, if necessary, to sell their bonds upon the market rather than to have put upon the statute books here a provision stating that 20 per cent of the capital and surplus of a bank can be loaned to one individual.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not going to oppose the consideration of this bill at the present time, but I want to make my position clear to the Senate.

I am in favor of the first section of the bill, which provides for the increase of the capital of the reserve banks, because I realize that one of the criticisms of this system was that probably we did not provide a sufficient capital for the Federal reserve banks at the time the legislation was enacted, and I think that appeals with a very great deal of force to foreign banking interests; but I am unalterably opposed to the second section of the bill. I do not think this country is interested in having some one get off of the Federal Reserve Board and immediately get into one of these member banks, and I am opposed to it.

As to the third proposition, the effect of it is going to be this: It is going to encourage the loaning of all the deposits of member banks to five borrowers. That is what it means; and I will never give my consent to that provision.

It is true that some reference is made here to the bond market, to the effect that we want to increase the use of these bonds. Of course, I am in harmony with that; but if one of these member banks has a large number of Government bonds it is not necessary for that bank to go to a regional reserve bank in order to use those bonds. It can either go out in the market and sell them, or it can go to other banks and get accommodations there with that security. I can never give my consent to a proposition which means that any bank can invite deposits from all of the community, and then loan out all of these deposits to five men. It is vicious banking; and while I have the profoundest respect for the Federal Reserve Board, I never can give my consent to a modification of the law which will permit that method of banking.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken in saying that it is proposed to allow any bank to loan out all of its deposits to five men.

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President; I simply said that it encourages that proposition. That was my statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It may have only $100,000 capital and it may have $1,000,000 of deposits. If it loans $20,000 to each of five men, it has only loaned $100,000, and it still has $900,000 to loan, or at least it has several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. POMERENE. I do think that to that extent my statement should be corrected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But at the present time all I am asking for is the immediate consideration of the bill; and if the Senate wants to adopt only the first provision I am willing to submit to that by a simple vote, without any discussion, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want to go that far; but I do want the Senator to let the bill go over, and then I want a little time to study it more than I have in the casual reading of it to-day. So far as the Senator from Nebraska is concerned, he can bring it up to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Unfortunately, the Senator from Nebraska can not do that. He is leaving town to-night; and the board is very urgent about this, because the surplus earnings of 1918 are the ones as to which Congress has got to say now, or very soon, what shall be done with them.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to vote for the enactment of that provision, because it tends toward safety. Nobody will object to that. If the balance of the bill is stricken out, as far as I am concerned, it can pass right now—I mean with only that one provision in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Have the Senators agreed on what shall pass?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know that that can be done very well by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. The safest way is to let the bill go over. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 405, submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] on the 3d instant, and I ask for its immediate consideration. I will say that it will not lead to any discussion.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That S. Res. 374, instructing the Committee on Manufactures to make inquiry into the coal situation, its production, transportation, and consumption, to require the attendance of necessary witnesses, the production of books, documents, and papers, etc., be, and it hereby is, amended so as to authorize the employment of counsel to assist in the inquiry aforesaid.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 5306) to recognize the patriotic services of members of the district and local draft boards of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5307) for the relief of the Red Wing Brewing Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 5308) for the relief of the Eastern Transportation Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 5309) granting a pension to Erastus A. Buck; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 5310) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Hahn (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5311) granting an increase of pension to Henry L. Bannow; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 5312) to donate a piece of field artillery to Girard College, of Philadelphia, Pa.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 5313) authorizing the Secretary of War to acquire and maintain a cemetery in France in the name of the United States for the reception and interment of the bodies of American officers and men who lost their lives in connection with the European war, and to appropriate $500,000 therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committe on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 5315) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver one cannon to the city of Orlando, in the State of Florida; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 5316) granting the consent of Congress to Wenatchee-Beebe Orchard Co. to construct a bridge across the Columbia River at or within 4 miles northerly from the town of Chelan Falls, in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Commerce.

REPEAL OF ESPIONAGE ACT.

Mr. FRANCE. I introduce a bill and give notice that at the close of the morning business to-day I shall ask to submit some brief observations upon it.

The bill (S. 5314) to repeal "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," and the act amendatory thereof, was read twice by its title.

THE GREEK SITUATION.

Mr. GRONNA. I present resolutions from a Greek association. They are brief, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN IMMEDIATE APPEAL TO AMERICA BY THE PEOPLE OF GREECE.

To whom it may concern:

In view of President Wilson's principle of "self-determination," as enunciated by him in his desire to see justice established in a free world, the people of Greece, as well as the 3,000,000 unredeemed Greeks now under Turkish and Bulgarian rule, feel that the people of America will take a special interest in the danger which threatens the just cause of Hellenism through the continued German and Bulgarian influence, which is still being exerted and always will be, in some form or another, unless the present favorable opportunity is seized of checking once and for all this evil tendency.

Up to the present time, owing to the lack of communications, very little information has apparently reached this country with regard to the heroic part played by the Greek Army in the military operations which led to the complete defeat of the Bulgarian forces on the Balkan front. And yet, it should be borne in mind that it was the mobilization and actual presence on the front of the Greek Army which rendered the general offensive on the Balkan front possible, while, on the other hand, the excellent conduct of the Greek soldiers, their bravery and discipline, their surprising rapidity in attack and pursuit, and, generally, their first-rate military qualities, have repeatedly been the object of unstinted praise and admiration on the part of the commanding French and British generals, who did not hesitate to assign to the Greek Army an important share in the final victory.

Of the hardships and sufferings endured by the Greeks under Bulgarian rule, and for centuries under Turkish tyranny, there is, of course, much to be said. Their history is just one long reign of terror, a good idea of which can be gained from Mr. Ward Price's dispatch to the New York Times, which has thrown a flood of vivid light on what has hitherto been willfully shrouded in darkness, and has revealed to the world at large the truth about the inhuman savagery of the Bulgarians. As the Times editorial of November 20 aptly says: "It is a horrible story, but Americans may read it with profit." Certainly, when the whole truth becomes known, the American people will realize that the fate of the inhabitants of Belgium and northern France during these last four years of German occupation has in no way been more terrible than that of the Greeks under Bulgarian and Turkish rule.

Abandoned by indifferent Europe in 1453, in the face of overwhelming Turkish hordes, the enslaved Greeks of the Ottoman Empire, in whose native language the gospels and epistles of St. Paul were written, still remain to-day the sole bulwark of the Christian faith in the East, while their achievements, under the most adverse conditions, in commerce, science, and all intellectual spheres, are such as to warrant unlimited faith in their rapid development, when the shackles of tyranny are lifted. To quote from a letter written by President Wilson to Mr. Frank W. Jackson, chairman of the relief committee for the Greeks of Asia Minor: "Their steadfast allegiance to their Christian faith in the face of every inducement and threat to abandon it, commends them most strongly to all who believe in the principles of religious freedom, and their adherence to the ideals of constitutional government should make them peculiarly the object of the cordial sympathy of the American people, the foundation stones of whose political structure are freedom and liberty."

Now, that the supreme moment is at hand, when, at the peace table, the fate of Hellenism will be decided, enemy influences are being exerted to mislead the American people and to circumvent the rules laid down by President Wilson, whereby all people should be free to determine for themselves their own existence. Therefore we say, let the American people be on their guard and, with wise discrimination, pluck forth this poisonous weed and in its place sow the seeds of everlasting love and gratitude, that will unite forever the people whose ancestors more than 2,000 years ago first established and used this Greek word "democracy," and the great free Nation of the New World, which has carried the old idea to its present perfection.

All we ask for is justice, the return to their motherland of the following unredeemed Greek regions:

1. Epirus, including Himara, Korytza, Kastoria.
2. Macedonia, including the purely Greek towns of Xanthi and Dedeagatch.
3. Thrace, including Constantinople and the country surrounding the sea of Marmara.
4. Asia Minor, Smyrna, and the contiguous territories, inhabited by nearly 2,000,000 Greeks.
5. The islands of the Dodecanese, which are inhabited only by Greeks, with the exception of 11,000 Turks in Rhodes and Cos and 4,000 Jews in Rhodes.

In thus pointing to the injustice so long endured by Greece we appeal to the American people to make use of every constitutional means at their disposal in order that the glorious deed of restitution should be accomplished; we appeal to them to make their wishes known to their Representatives in Congress, both by letter and telegram, so that the principles upheld by their President should be vindicated the whole world over and become an article of faith for regenerated mankind when the Prince of Peace shall have come into His own.

Former Governor of Salonika, Greece.

REPUBLIC OF COSTA RICA.

Mr. MOSES. I present an address presented to the President of the United States by the President of the Senate of Costa Rica, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY OF THE CONGRESS,
SAN JOSE OF COSTA RICA, 21 November, 1918.

His Excellency PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Washington:

In fulfillment of the resolution that was unanimously, by acclamation, adopted by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies of this Republic, at the session of the 19th instant, and as an interpretation and manifest spirit of that resolution, we have the honor to address the following communication to your excellency, by wireless telegraphy, whilst a formal transcription thereof is proceeding by mail:

"Upon the proclamation, through the illustrious medium of your excellency, of the very beautiful program of ideals for men, for nations, and for humanity, the United States of America entered upon the gigantic conflict of the world war, originally provoked in defense of the rights of small nationalities.

"Adopting those beautiful ideals, and acting through a lofty sentiment of continental solidarity, the little Republic of Costa Rica, through the medium of its constitutionally organized powers, declared a state of war to exist between it and the German Empire, in order thus to profess its profound sympathy and unconditional support of the doctrines proclaimed by the allied nations—this being the extent to which, because of its size and the meagerness of its sinews of war, Costa Rica could aid.

"Costa Rica to-day celebrates with the greatest enthusiasm the favorable outcome of the war and, with the most sincere rejoicing, the triumph of the doctrines proclaimed by your excellency and by the American armies gloriously established upon the fields of battle.

"Your idea of the league of nations is firmly grounded on nature considered as a social factor and is altogether an indispensable complement to the establishment of the loyal and enduring peace throughout the world.

"Such a peace you have admirably planned to found upon three immovable bases; the right of peoples to freely govern themselves; the right of nations to freely control their destinies; and the right of humanity to freely pursue the course of its perfection.

"Your conception works for redemption and for this reason, chiefly, Costa Rica, fully aware of the consequences, did not hesitate to align itself by the side of her great sister whose destiny so brilliantly directed in this awful conflict, must be the betterment of humanity.

"In these memorable moments in which your excellency raises on high the standard of humanity this small country ventures to acclaim the fact of its devotion to that standard, because the fundamental principles which you have written upon that banner have been at all times adhered to by the Republic of Costa Rica; its people now and always have freely chosen its governors; as a nation it has always been able to maintain its sovereignty with dignity and prestige; as an integral part of the world it has never placed obstacles in the way of others, but, on the contrary, it has contributed, within the small means at its disposal, to the progressive march of humanity.

"Costa Rica, through the medium of its legally constituted representatives, expresses the hope that your excellency will accord to our Government the place in the family of sovereign nations to which it is entitled, for Costa Rica has always respected the rights of peoples, of nations, and of humanity.

"To this end the Senate and Chamber of Deputies has authorized us, under the circumstances, to respectfully inform Your Excellency and the Congress of the United States of North America that the Government of Senor don Federico A. Tinoco, as well as all powers instituted thereunder, are constituted by the suffrage of the Costa Rican people, convoked in free election, extended to all the peoples by which said Government, as well as all constituted authorities, exercise their functions; that the Government of Senor Tinoco, as well as the legislative and judicial powers of this Republic, are not only founded upon incontestable legality but legally exercise their functions and for that reason are justly entitled to look for recognition by other States.

"The investiture of President Tinoco and other members of the legislative and judicial powers with their respective authority is based upon the suffrage and the fundamental law.

"Such, then, is the correct aspect in which the political situation of the Republic should be viewed, and it is respectfully brought to Your Excellency's attention in order to realize the aspiration of the Costa Rican people which the Congress has embodied in the resolution. It justly claims the honor and the benefit of recognition on the part of nations that so far have not deigned to favor this country with official relations, and for that reason the legislative bodies hope that such desire will be favorably considered by Your Excellency, who is the apostle of equality and liberty of nations, and who has made his apostolicy felt in a form that will be preserved ever after in history."

We are Your Excellency's most respectful servants,

DR. RAFAEL CALDERÓN MUÑOZ,
President of the Senate.
LIC. FRANCISCO FAERRON,
President of the Chamber of Deputies.
RICARDO COTO FERNANDEZ,
DR. FRANCISCO A. SEGREDA,
Secretaries of the Senate.
JULIO ESQUIVEL,
FRANKLIN JIMÉNEZ,
Secretaries of the Chamber of Deputies.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a sort of a brief entitled "Reciprocal Representation in the World's Assembly and International Bonding Remedies against Recurrence of War," by Emil G. Beck, M. D., of Chicago, Ill. It contains, I think, some very useful suggestions, and while I do not want to say that I either approve it or disapprove it, I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECIPROCAL REPRESENTATION IN A WORLD'S ASSEMBLY AND INTERNATIONAL BONDING REMEDIES AGAINST RECURRENCE OF WAR.

[By Emil G. Beck, M. D., Chicago, Ill.]

The essential points:

A. An international legislative body, with judicial powers, chosen by reciprocal method: Each nation to send at least seven representatives, but instead of choosing all members from its own citizens each nation to select two from its own country and one from each of five foreign countries. This reciprocal method of choosing representatives will form an extraordinary assemblage of statesmen who will form a very impartial world's parliament and not likely to form cliques.

B. All nations to enter into a universal alliance treaty (bond) which contains the provisions against hostilities between nations and which is secured by heavy bonds of the cosigners—bonds not their own issue.

C. A suggestion for the formation and economical upkeep of an international army (reciprocal) which in peace times serves as a national police and serves part time in foreign countries.

In his epoch-making address of January 22, 1917, President Wilson said:

"In every discussion of the peace that must end this war it is taken for granted that the peace must be given by some definite concert of power which will make it virtually impossible that any such catastrophe should ever overwhelm us again. Every lover of mankind, every sane and thoughtful man, must take that for granted."

This lofty declaration of our President, no doubt, voices the most intense desire and sentiment of every well-meaning person. The only excuse for a repetition of this terrible catastrophe would be the failure of the nations to devise a plan by which future wars would be made impossible.

The world's greatest statesmen and political economists are now at work devising plans by which a fraternity among all nations may be maintained, of which the league of nations stands foremost. In the upheaval and chaos which exist at present the task is most difficult, but they have already defined the principles on the bases of which the problem will be worked out.

The main obstacle to a lasting peace is the fact that it is almost impossible to secure a court of arbitration which would be regarded by all nations as absolutely impartial. It lacks in one essential, namely: It does not provide against the possible danger of combinations by the representatives from the different countries who, in deciding matters of vital interest, might cast the weight of their votes to that country to which they owe allegiance. A nation is not willing to submit its case for arbitration to a body of judges unless they are convinced that in the hands of these judges its interests would be safeguarded to at least the same degree as they were before being placed before these judges.

A world's court, composed of delegates chosen by each country from its own citizens, when put to a test is likely to fall in its mission. Men with the highest ideals and regard for the rights of others, with the best intentions to be impartial, will, when the fate of their own country is in the balance, sway to the side of their native land. A Frenchman will remain a Frenchman, a German will remain a German, and a citizen of the United States will always remain a true American when his own country is in danger. Men who can divest themselves of the love for their native land in order to become international citizens are yet to be found; in times of peace, possibly, but when the country which gave them birth and education and protection is endangered their instinct will paralyze their impartiality and they will cling to their mother country. Quoting Prof. Adler: "The judges you secure may be upright men, but the bias in the blood will tell. We had this exemplified amongst ourselves in the case of the Hayes-Tilden commission. The country was on the verge of civil war. It was finally decided to pass the matter in dispute over to 15 jurists, the best in the country. No one doubted their uprightness nor their disposition to be fair. But every time they voted on a material question the commission stood eight to seven—eight Republicans to seven Democrats. And the impartial historian says that it was the bias of party which in this crucial instance, though they were not conscious of it, gave direction to the legal mind."

Since it is the duty of every thoughtful citizen to be helpful in solving this intricate problem, I hope it will not seem presumptuous for a man of the medical profession to contribute his small part in its solution.

The plan herein submitted does not come into competition with or overthrow any of the plans proposed by others; it simply adds several new ideas. It is based upon two fundamental principles:

First. That reciprocity is a most potent factor in retaining the friendship of your neighbor.

Second. That a bond is stronger than a mere promise.

Both these principles are embodied in the plan—one in the formation of an impartial international legislative and judical assembly, choosing its members reciprocally, and the other suggesting an international alliance treaty secured by heavy bonding.

INTERNATIONAL LEGISLATIVE BODY WITH JUDICIAL POWER (RECIPROCAL).

This assembly shall, as far as possible, consist of representatives from all countries. But instead of each nation electing its representatives from its country alone each should choose two from its own and five additional representatives from other nations, but no more than one from any one foreign country. Thus all nations would have an opportunity in time of peace of choosing men well known to them, in whose integrity and honesty they have the fullest confidence and to whom they would unhesitatingly submit matters of international dispute and by whose decision they would abide.

By this system of choosing representatives the danger of partiality to one's own country would materially diminish. Each representative would then consider it a point of honor to deal fairly with the country which placed implicit confidence in him. As a matter of self-interest he would act squarely and impartially, because his own country is in turn dependent upon the honesty and fairness of the foreign representatives his own country selected. Such interlocking representation would thus blend the interests of all nations, and the personal contact of the representatives would inevitably result in a very friendly relationship among nations. Reciprocity of delegates would thus create the strongest link possible between the powers, each realizing that it is to their mutual interest to treat one another with fairness and justice.

A very valuable suggestion was offered to me by one of the United States Senators to whom I submitted this problem, namely, that this assembly would necessarily have legislative power as well as judicial, since they could not decide international disputes unless they had international laws and rules as a basis for their discussions. He states:

"It is apparent, therefore, that the first step is a great international legislature rather than an international court, a legislature that shall determine and agree upon fundamental international rights which in themselves will include fundamental international duties of the countries toward each other. Having determined just what these rights are, having by the very instrument itself pledged all to protect the rights of each, then, and then only, can we provide for a great international court which must be guided by those fundamental rights and corresponding duties. Nations are free. Nations must agree together just to what extent the freedom of each may be curtailed. Having entered into that agreement there will be little difficulty in providing for an international court to decide all of the minor questions of differences under the guidance of this supreme international law."

Since the assembly would be composed of the ablest and most high-minded men in the world, the legislative duties could also be intrusted to them so that it would not only dispose of cases of international litigation but would also pass new international laws and work out other problems relating to the welfare of the whole human race.

Furthermore the nations joining this international brotherhood would no more surrender any part of their sovereignty than the original thirteen Colonies gave up their State rights when they formed the United States.

The members of this international assembly might select from their midst a smaller number, say 15, to form an international supreme court of appeals, to whose final decision any dispute might be appealed should it fail to obtain satisfactory settlement by the international court of justice.

This legislative and judicial assembly, once established, would systematize international administration similar to that of a democratic government.

INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCE TREATY.

When the belligerents meet to adjust their differences one question will stand out most prominently, namely, What measures shall be taken to compel all nations to live up to their treaties? New treaties will have to be entered into, and here the difficulties will arise. At present, treaties are not regarded with the same sacredness, confidence, and respect by all the powers as they were before this war. Striking examples have given us sufficient proof of this fact. Nations will now be reluctant in signing new treaties unless they receive the absolute assurance that some power even greater than the sword will compel the cosigners to live up to their agreements. They will demand a positive guarantee that the papers they sign are not mere formalities, which might again be thrown into the wastebasket when at any time the terms of the treaty do not suit one or the other party to the contract.

What satisfactory guarantee could be given to induce the powers to sign treaties and abide by them? To this question I desire to make the following suggestion:

Let the nations enter into a treaty which shall be so carefully worked out as to cover all the essential points necessary to maintain peace and secure its fulfillment by demanding the cosigning nations to put up a bond. The terms of such a treaty must necessarily cover many points embodying a code of international laws to be drafted by the international assembly.

Certain basic and essential principles must be included, some of which I mention herein:

First. All international disputes shall be submitted to the international assembly described above.

Second. In case the verdict of the international assembly be rejected by one of the contestants, it shall be submitted to the international court of appeals, whose decision shall be final.

Third. To prevent the violation of this international-alliance treaty, each country shall deposit a most substantial interest-bearing bond.

Fourth. Gradual disarmament of all nations to such a degree as to leave an army and navy for protection against internal violence and international police only.

Fifth. All countries shall be prohibited from manufacturing armament and munitions to any greater extent than agreed upon by the international assembly.

A serious violation by a nation of the international alliance treaty shall constitute sufficient cause for the forfeiture of its bond. As to what should be done with the forfeited bonds is a question which could easily be decided by those elaborating on the treaty. It could either be used for current expenses of the international assembly or in paying indemnities to any nation which has been unjustly attacked or injured, or for other purposes.

Special treaties between individual nations need not be secured by any additional bonds, because all questions of dispute would be settled by an international assembly and its decision made binding.

The bonds shall be placed in the hands of an international board of trustees, chosen by all the countries which enter into this international agreement.

The objection that a nation might repudiate its bond should a real emergency arise is met by the provision that the bonds furnished should not be paper of its own issue but securities issued and purchased from other countries, thus making their repudiation practically impossible.

To illustrate the latter proposition: Germany, for instance, would deposit securities purchased from other countries. The amounts purchased from each country to be so proportioned as to furnish a variety of securities of as many countries as possible—for instance, 10 per cent of French bonds, 10 per cent of English bonds, 10 per cent of United States bonds, 5 per cent of Swiss bonds, 5 per cent of Argentine bonds, 60 per cent of all other countries, government or industrial.

England, Russia, the United States, and all other countries entering the alliance to do likewise. The aggregate value of deposit by each nation must be so large as to make it prohibitive for that nation to forfeit it.

Judging from the opinions of statesmen and professors of international law to whom a previous copy of this paper has been submitted, I am confident that an international assembly chosen by the reciprocal method and a joint treaty of all nations diplomatically constructed (with the additional safeguard of a heavy bond against its violation) would be a sure step toward the realization of a lasting peace.

AN INTERNATIONAL RECIPROCITY ARMY.

We must, however, bear in mind that in the present turmoil it would be inexpedient to make a very radical reduction in the naval or military strength of the world. Radical changes must not be made suddenly; improvement must take place by a slow process. For this reason it will be necessary, for the present, for each country to maintain a certain military and naval force until there is a readjustment of present international affairs. Time will change conditions; the relations among nations will again become fraternal, but until such time we must retain a weapon aside from these agreements. A more potent restraint must be kept as a safeguard in order to check an ambitious belligerent who might suddenly break all rules and promises should he become involved in a controversy which he believes is not adjudicable.

If, then, for the present, it is absolutely necessary to retain a certain amount of force as a safeguard, could we suggest some practical and economical upkeep of an international army?

If the nations were assured that they could count upon each other for their combined but small forces against an aggressor, it would be entirely superfluous for each of them to maintain a large military organization. On the other hand, if each nation must individually protect its own rights and interests, each would be obliged to maintain an army so large that at any time it might be pitted against a combination of other powers who are equally prepared. This stupendous competition for preparedness is absorbing the greater part of the energy and the savings of the human race. They are now kept busy devising plans to kill human beings and destroy property, instead of being employed in the wholesome pursuits of life and in the development of the races. A small force allotted to each nation in its proper proportion would be just as effective in deciding the so-called "nonadjudicable" questions as a large force on each side, and it would be vastly more economical. I would, therefore, suggest a plan which would be most economical and at the same time sufficiently effective to check any attempt on the part of any nation to create war.

A. Each nation to have a standing army of well-trained, well-paid soldiers, not larger than is actually necessary to protect itself against internal disturbances.

B. The size of this army should be in proportion to the population.

C. The armies of all countries should have a combined general staff, so that the armies may be trained on the same principles of warfare and should be so organized that on the shortest notice a call would bring together a force large enough to check an unjust aggression.

D. Finally, a number of regiments of the army of one country should be stationed in different sections of foreign countries for a stated period. For illustration, an American soldier would serve one year at home, six months in France, and six months in Germany, and the French or German soldier would have a like experience. This would give all armies an equal chance to perfect themselves in military training and become acquainted with the military tactics of allied countries. At the same time, the military force of all countries would become familiar with the terrain of the various countries, which, in case of a sudden outbreak of war, would be of great advantage to the combined powers in checking the aggressor.

Such military education might create a friendly spirit among the different armies. It would work out in a manner similar to that of the reciprocal representation of jurists of all countries. Aside from policing the country in peace times, the armies could be of service in many ways as teaching citizenship to immigrants and maintaining a merchant marine.

I realize that this plan is not worked out in detail, and there are, no doubt, many points not covered. But if I have succeeded in convincing those who are now studying this question, that reciprocity is fundamental for international harmony, and that bonds will be an added safeguard against the recurrence of war, I will be satisfied that I have helped in bringing this problem nearer its solution.

LIGNITE COAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. POINDEXTER conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

H. R. 5989. An act to grant certain lands to the town of Olathe, Colo., for the protection of its water supply;

H. R. 8625. An act to accept from the Southern Oregon Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, a reconveyance of the lands granted to the State of Oregon by the act approved March 3, 1869, entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos Bay to Roseburg, in said State," commonly known as the Coos Bay Wagon Road grant, to provide for the disposition of said lands, and for other purposes;

H. R. 12210. An act to amend the act of May 14, 1898, as amended by the act of March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to extend the homestead laws and to regulate the sale and entry of public lands along the shore of navigable waters in Alaska";

H. R. 12579. An act to grant to citizens of Malheur County, Oreg., the right to cut timber in the State of Idaho for agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, and to remove such timber to Malheur County, Oreg; and

H. R 13042. An act providing for the extension of time for the reclamation of certain lands in the State of Oregon under the Carey Act.

H. R. 4246. An act to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Connecticut was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 12881. An act to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

H. R. 13306. An act to authorize the payment of allotments out of the pay of enlisted men in certain cases in which these payments have been discontinued was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, day before yesterday I gave notice that it was my intention to submit some remarks to-day on the proposition of a world league of nations and on the coming peace conference and connected subjects. However, I forgot and left at home this morning a book from which I want to read some extracts when I submit my remarks, and I will not be able to make to-day the remarks that I intended to make. I hope to-morrow at the close of the morning business, if I may be permitted to do so, to submit the remarks that I had intended to make to-day on a league of nations, the coming peace conference, and some incidents connected therewith.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Saturday, at the close of the morning business, I shall ask permission to address the Senate on the subject of a league of nations.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to make a short statement in reply to a number of addresses that have been made here upon the subject of affairs in Russia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? There is none. Is there any objection to the Senator from Nebraska proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, recently the administration has been criticized from two standpoints on the Russian situation. First, it has been criticized to some extent because it did not yield to the urgent desire of Great Britain and France and enter Russia with a large force for the purpose of establishing or reestablishing an eastern front against Germany. More recently it has been criticized on the floor of the Senate by a number of Senators because it has sent soldiers into Russia. On these two criticisms it seems to me proper to make a short statement, which can not in the nature of the case be authoritative, because I only speak from what knowledge I have been able to gain, which is, perhaps, not much better than that any other Senator has secured. These two attacks, however, come from directly opposite directions, and they indicate the embarrassment that confronted President Wilson in deciding what policy to adopt.

Geographically, of course, there is a Russia. Politically there has not been a Russia for probably a year. When we entered the war we entered it side by side with Russia, as well as with the other nations that were allied with Russia to fight Germany. When the Russian revolution first developed and Kerensky came to the head of the Russian Government, it still retained a semblance at least of a national shape and form. We recognized that Government of Russia. We sent a commission over there, as will be remembered, headed by ex-Senator Root. That Russian Government along about the month of October or November, 1917, was overthrown, and since that time it is not too much to say that there has been no government, as civilization understands government, in Russia, except a series of local governments throughout the vast expanse of that Empire.

The Lenine-Trotsky government has been far more prominent than any other in Russia, because it held Petrograd, the capital, and Moscow, the ancient city of Russia, and some of the other industrial centers. It was prominent because it was recognized by Germany. Germany had been the only nation which recognized it as a national government.

The statement has been made that the Lenine-Trotsky government was not pro-German. I am unable to see how that statement can be believed by anyone who has read the history of the last year. In the first place, Lenine and Trotsky got into Russia by the grace of Germany. There is very substantial reason for believing and considerable evidence to prove that Lenine and Trotsky operated with German credit. Certainly in everything that they have done they have carried out the will of Germany. They signed with Germany a treaty which practically gave Germany everything she asked for, including a large sum of money, which they had already begun to send to Germany when the belligerent nations fighting Germany put a stop to it. They established in Petrograd, near by, a German ambassador, and Russian and other travelers who have come to this country from Russia have told me that he rules virtually as a king in Petrograd.

Not only that, but the Lenine-Trotsky government has driven out of Russia every representative of every civilized country on the face of the earth, including our own, and to-day, except for the German representative in Petrograd, there is not a single representative of any nation in the world except, perhaps, of Switzerland, and he is in jail.

To say under those circumstances that there is either a national government in Russia or that it is not pro-German seems to me to be going entirely too far. Whatever Germany asked for she got from Russia. German officers and German soldiers who were captured and prisoners held in camp have been released and permitted to organize forces which undertook, in connection with the Bolsheviki, to crush the little Czecho-Slovak Army in Russia.

I have in my hand a photograph, which I procured from the State Department, showing Russian soldiers gathered in a large group and among them German officers in uniform. The statement attached to this photograph reads as follows:

> The attached photograph was obtained from an official Bolsheviki photographer through a dependable intermediary; it was taken shortly after the capture of Yaroslavl northeast of Moscow by the Bolsheviki forces in the latter part of July, 1918. The photograph was sent to the department as confirming information previously obtained from independent sources that the Bolsheviki forces were enabled to drive their opponents from Yaroslavl by reason of direct German military aid, reference apparently being had to the German uniforms to be noted.

Mr. President, I have in my hand here among other things a statement made by Capt. Vladimir S. Hurban, of the Czecho-Slovak army in Russia, when he came to the United States to visit Prof. T. G. Masaryk, then in this country and now the duly elected President of the new Czecho-Slovak Government. He described in this statement how the Czecho-Slovak Army, 50,000 or 60,000 strong, as I recall it, was formed in Russia at the time Russia was fighting Germany. Those Czecho-Slovaks had been originally in the Austrian Army and refused to fight their Russian brothers, and had gone over and surrendered in a great body to the Russians, and by the Russians at the time Russia was fighting Germany, before the days of the Lenine-Trotsky revolution, the Czecho-Slovaks were organized into a force fighting Germany among the Russians.

After Trotsky-Lenine surrendered to the Germans this sturdy band of Czecho-Slovaks resolved neither to surrender to the Germans nor to accept the clemency offered by the Emperor of Austria. They could not fight all Germany alone. They resolved, if possible, to go through Russia and reach Vladivostok, to cross the Pacific, to cross North America, and then to go to the western front in France in order to continue the war for liberty upon which they had entered. Capt. Hurban says:

> Our army in Russia was organized from Czech and Slovak prisoners of war under almost insurmountable difficulties. We were cooperating with the Russian Army, and since 1917 we were practically the only army on the Russian front capable of any military action in the proper sense of the word. In July, 1917, during the first revolutionary offensive under Kerensky, it was only our army that really attacked and advanced.
> When the Bolsheviki-Soviet government signed the peace treaty at the beginning of March, our army of about 50,000 men was in Ukraine, near Kiev.

Then he goes on to describe what they did, and says:

> The Germans advanced against us in overwhelming numbers, and there was danger that we would be surrounded on all sides, on the right and left flank; our rear was not covered, and the Germans were liable to attack us from the rear. We had no lines of communication behind us, no stores of materials, and no reserves; everywhere there was disorganization and anarchy, and the Bolsheviki red guards seized the locomotives and were fleeing east in panic.
> Under these circumstances Emperor Charles sent us a special envoy with the promise that if we disarm we will be "amnestied" and our lands will receive "autonomy." We answered that we will not negotiate with the Austrian Emperor.
> As we could not hold a front, we began a retreat to the east. Already then in agreement with the allies (our army had been proclaimed a part of the Czecho-Slovak Army on the western front, and thus allied with the French Army), it was decided to transport our army over Siberia and America to France. We began the difficult retreat from Kiev. The Germans in an overwhelming force were trying to prevent our escape. About a hundred miles behind us they seized the important railroad junction at Bachmac, which we were obliged to pass in our trains on our retreat to the east.

Then he goes on to describe the contests not only with the German Army but with released German prisoners in Russia, released on orders of the Bolsheviki for the purpose of attacking and annihilating this Czecho-Slovak Army.

The story is too long for me to read, and I shall not encumber the RECORD with it, but I only cite it to show that we have an authoritative statement here to the effect that these Czecho-Slovak armies stood at that time in Russia as the one organized body to fight Germany as we were fighting Germany. This not only shows the pro-German character of the Trotzky-Lenine government, but it shows that Russia, which had ceased to be a nation, and over which anarchy and civil war were spreading, was the battle ground upon which Germany must be fought, and here were fifty or sixty thousand men trying to wage that war.

Under those circumstances Great Britain and France were very urgent that America should do her part in entering by way of Vladivostok on the Pacific Ocean and making safe this long line of communication, 5,000 miles, to the Ural Mountains in Russia. What was to be done? Was the President to ignore that body of Czecho-Slovaks? Was he to refuse entirely the request of the nations that we were cooperating with? Was he to permit the Germans absolutely to get control of Russia and use it as an instrument in the war? It seems to me he could do nothing less than he did. He finally consented that a small force of Americans, 10,200, should be landed at Vladivostok in connection with the Japanese, British, and French forces there, and not only take possession of the great stores of munitions, which had come from America, but also to undertake to perfect in connection with the other forces this long line of communication so that the Czecho-Slovaks could either get out and get to France, or if they remained there to fight to have supplies brought to them.

We landed 10,000 men. The Japanese landed a much larger force, which they have since been reducing. The effect of that landing was to put a stop to the organization of German prisoners, of whom there were 58,000 in that part of Siberia. It made it impossible for them to capture Vladivostok, as was intended. The effect of that landing was to restore to a more or less perfect extent that long line of communication, and to-day for over 5,000 miles from Vladivostok to the neighborhood of the Ural Mountains that line of communication is in more or less constant operation.

It is idle to say under those circumstances that the 2,000 men we sent in and the small body of Japanese and British sent in could have subjugated that whole country. The fact is that they were received with open arms. They went in as allies and friends of all that part of Russia. They did not go in as conquerors, and they do not leave there as conquerors to-day. There is a local government functioning at Vladivostok in entire harmony with the allied troops that are there. There is local government at Omsk functioning in entire harmony. Of course, it is a dictatorship at the present time, under Kolchak. For a while it was five men, and now it is practically one man, who has perhaps 200,000 under his control. He is maintaining a front there against the Soviet powers, supported by German officers and German men. There is a government at Vladivostok; there is a large force operating down in south Russia near the line of the Caucasus; and there is the government which has been organized at Archangel and down the Murman coast, also recognizing the Kolchak government and a Russian Army outside of the Lenine-Trotzky government.

Now, can it be said that we have gone in to fight the Government of Russia when over this whole region of 5,000 miles we are received with satisfaction and applause and cooperation? Can it be said that when we went in to fight Germany on ground chosen by Germany against agents chosen by Germany we went in illegally to fight the Russian Government and the Russian people? No, Mr. President; I think there was every justification for going in.

I have spoken of landing at Vladivostok with 10,200 men. We also made a landing at Archangel. Archangel has been the port at which vast supplies of war munitions and coal have been landed from Great Britain. Our army of occupation went in there to save those supplies, for one thing. It went in there also on the Murman coast, just across the White Sea, for the purpose of preventing Germany from carrying out the purpose which she evidently had at that time to secure a port and a base for her submarine vessels.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming that there was sufficient justification for sending an armed force into Russia at the time it was sent, when we were fighting Germany before the armistice was signed, and that there was a German force there, do I understand from the Senator that we are still contending against the same enemy with whom we were contending prior to the signing of the armistice?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall come to that a little later. I am trying to develop this in some order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the Senator to state that our troops at Archangel and Vladivostok were there in harmony with the people of those communities. The information comes to me directly that we are fighting there.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will take that up. At Vladivostok there has been no fighting. It is entirely peaceable, and the normal course of business has been resumed. It is one of the most orderly places in all Russia at the present time. There has been some fighting at Archangel and some fighting on the Murman coast, very close to that. We have, as a matter of fact, only 5,000 men between Archangel and the Murman coast combined. France and Great Britain have larger bodies of troops; I do not know exactly how many; perhaps 15,000. We seized those ports because they had great supplies there which had to be protected, which had been made with American and British and French labor and paid for by American, British, and French money when we thought we were sending them to a nation allied with us. We not only took those ports because we had a right to protect those supplies, but because we wanted to head off Germany, that then had 30,000 men crossing Finland for the purpose of seizing the Murman coast and establishing there a port for her submarines.

There is another reason. We know how anxious we were in this country concerning our diplomatic representatives in Petrograd, who finally were compelled to move to Vologda, which is in the direction of Archangel. By seizing Archangel we made means by which they could get out of Russia, and they might have had none other. We know that several murders and assassinations had occurred there; that there were most disgraceful, barbaric assaults upon the British Embassy there in which a fine British officer—I think a naval attaché—was shot down in cold blood. Before our ambassador left a sentry had been placed in front of his door and he had been practically notified that he would be under military surveillance and control unless he came back to Petrograd.

With such barbaric treatment of diplomatic representatives, it was a very wise thing to have possession of some ports, in order that there might be, if necessary, a means of getting out. The idea that a government exists under the administration of Lenine and Trotzky to-day in the sense that civilized people could call it a government is absolutely preposterous. There is not any government there; it is the most absolute tyranny; and if we were against the idea of the old autocratic form of government, we certainly must condemn, as we have refused to recognize, the form of an absolute tyranny of the most brutal character, which recognizes no law whatever.

I was talking the other day to one of the secretaries of our embassy, who has recently returned from Russia, and who has now already left this country for another post. He told me of sitting in the office of a commissaire, I think, and it was in Vologda, and talking to him and endeavoring to get a permit or some better treatment for the embassy, when a clerk brought in a number of documents and placed them on his desk, and he took up his pen and signed them, one after another, without even reading them. They were so near to him that this gentleman was able to see what they were, and each one of them was a sentence of death, which that man signed just as though it had been a formal letter.

That is what is going on in Russia, and when this man undertook to leave Vologda, practically under compulsion, as it was unsafe longer to stay there, he went to the railroad station to buy his ticket an hour before leaving. He was told that there was no place on the train. He protested that that could not be so; that he must be able to buy a ticket. A commissaire was standing near, and he stepped up to him and said, "I have a friend who has a ticket which I can get for you." "What will he charge extra—anything?" "Yes; he wants"—I think he said—"50 rubles." The ticket only cost 50 rubles; but he said, "He wants to get 50 rubles extra for it if he sells it to you." So this American representative agreed that he would pay 50 rubles extra in order to get this ticket. The commissaire said, "You have got to pay me something for finding him for you"; and finally the official was compelled to pay this man 25 rubles for the privilege of paying 50 rubles extra for the ticket! Then the commissaire went around in the room and got the ticket from the man who had just refused to sell it to the American.

This American got aboard the train, which started. After the train had passed over the first division and into the second division it came to a stop. The passengers waited half an hour, then an hour, and finally they had a committee go to inquire what was the trouble, why the train did not go on. The reply was that the train crew was striking, and that they were not going on until the passengers raised a hundred rubles per car. The passengers went to work and they raised a hundred rubles per car. The train then proceeded. When it got to the next division of the road it stopped again, and they made more prompt inquiry this time to find out what the trouble was. They were told that the men in the roundhouse would not let the engine out to draw the train unless they raised a hundred rubles per car. They had to raise another hundred rubles per car. So it took them 40 hours to make a 10-hour trip. I merely cite that to show the absolute economic and industrial demoralization there. To say that that is a country with a government is absolutely absurd. There is no government in Russia.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Nebraska in the logical presentation of his view, but I hope before he closes that he will make it plain whether, all this being true, it is any justification for our being in Russia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will take that up immediately. We went in there, I say, as a war measure; we went in there last June, when the war was at its height. So far as Vladivostok was concerned we saved those supplies; we saved a long line of communications; we saved the Czecho-Slovak Army; we defeated the purpose of the Germans to destroy that army and to get possession of the country. We went into the Murman coast and prevented the Germans from getting a warm-water harbor there for their submarines as a base. We got Archangel, and kept that port with its supplies and the means of escape of our ambassador, who was still at that time in Russia. We accomplished what we went there for, but we went in by an agreement with Great Britain and Japan. We went in with them, and, as I have said, at the height of the war. We have not yet come to the end of the war, although we have an armistice. We could not instantly leave the minute the signing of the armistice had come. We could not abandon the stores there; we could not open the door and invite Germany now to make an offensive in that direction. We could not violate the agreement we have with those with whom we went in. We are under some obligations to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator from Nebraska state the agreement which we have?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is what we seek to know. That is why I have been listening so intently to the Senator as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, in the hope that we might learn some of the details. I take it that his speech is wholly authoritative, or the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee would not make it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from California will not assume that there was a written agreement that we would do certain things. The entrance into those ports was undertaken on the recommendation, if not by the demand, of the supreme war council in Paris as a war measure and when the war was at its height. I suppose that we have no more an agreement in writing to do that than we had with France and Great Britain when we joined the French and British in France. We went there, though, for the purpose of cooperating with them, and we are remaining to cooperate with them. We are on the Murman coast to cooperate with them, we are in Archangel to cooperate with them, and we are in Vladivostok to cooperate with them. We can not throw them down and abandon them in the twinkling of an eye while Germany is still threatening possibly to undertake war measures.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator will yield, I simply repeated the very language that he used in respect to an "agreement" that we have with these various powers, and, repeating that language, I ask him what the agreement was? I do not mean that it was a written agreement. I do not know but it is a secret treaty. I do not know what it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think I should withdraw the word "agreement." I think I should say in cooperation with those powers we went in there.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. While I am on my feet, so that I may not again interrupt the Senator—and I shall not do so, because I shall take the opportunity, with the permission of the Senate, at some time in the future to respond—but if the Senator will permit me one further question, How far inland are American troops now? Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The American troops are at Vladivostok, on the Pacific coast.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do not mean there; I mean on the Murmansk coast—from Archangel?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will make this statement complete. The American troops are at Vladivostok and in the immediate neighborhood, as I understand, on the Pacific coast. The Japanese troops are largely at Lake Baikal, which is perhaps a couple of thousand miles inland. Another body of French and British are cooperating with the Czecho-Slovaks perhaps 4,500 miles inland. The American troops are at Archangel and at Murman with the French and British. Their outposts have proceeded as far inland, possibly, as 80 or 100 miles in some cases, merely for the purpose of protecting those bases. We did not want to let the opposing forces under German leadership come right up to the ports. They have thrown these outposts out and they are merely holding them against attack.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Can the Senator from Nebraska tell how far Kadish is from Archangel?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not. I only have general information. It is somewhere in the neighborhood.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is the Senator able to say how many towns and cities and villages the American troops have taken?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does the Senator say that he does not know?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is the Senator able to say how great an area of square miles the American troops are operating in?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I have not any knowledge of that sort; that is military knowledge which I have not.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is the Senator aware that there are various towns that have been taken by American troops advancing into Russia and that they have been taken in each instance against troops stationed in those various towns?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any doubt that not only the American troops, but that the British and the French troops, have advanced far enough inland to protect those bases, and that they are now acting on the defensive. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] stated yesterday they are making no further advance, and that they only went far enough to protect their bases and to carry out the purposes for which they went there.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator say when the advance was discontinued?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I have not that date, and I do not consider it of any importance.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. They have, I believe, taken town after town as they have gone forward, have they not, and only ceased to advance because winter has made it essential that they cease?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken. My information is that they merely advanced far enough to set up the usual posts that are required to protect their bases, the base being in one case Archangel and in the other Murmansk; that the fighting that has occurred since then has been defensive; and that the Americans were expelled from one town by the Russian Bolsheviki, with their German assistants, but have recovered it. That is the only advance that I have heard of in recent months.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May we take it, then, as authoritatively announced by the State Department that no other advance is to be made?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should not like to speak for what may happen in the future.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May we assume, from the Senator's argument, that if it were not for the presence of the German influence in that country there would be no occasion for our remaining in Russia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my judgment. The German danger is the real cause of our presence there.

Mr. BORAH. Then I assume we are there under and by authority of Gen. Foch.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly. He insists, I understand, on maintaining the status there; in fact, he is anxious to have more done.

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President, we are arriving at a point from which we may reason as to our duty. The complaint which may be justly lodged against the situation, it seems to me, is that we have been in utter darkness as to why we are there, what the object to be attained is, or under whose authority we were there. Now, does the Senator say that we are there under the authority of Gen. Foch?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are there under the authority of the United States in cooperation with the other forces of which Foch is the generalissimo. We went in there to fight the Germans, as I have stated, at the time when the war was at its height and bid fair to continue for years, and at a time when Russia had been largely brought under German control, not only military control, but commercial and banking control, to the extent that the national-bank notes of Russia were being printed in Germany.

Mr. BORAH. To my mind there can be only one justification for our being in Russia, and that is because of the situation superinduced by German activities. If I may be permitted to express my view, it is none of our business so far as military intervention is concerned as to what is going on in Russia. Unless it is part and parcel of the conflict in which we have been engaged, which is the defeat of Germany, we can not justify remaining there any longer than it will take to get out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. It ought to be made so plain that there could be no possible mistake about it that we are there by reason of that fact; that we have remained there by reason of that fact; and what it is that we are to accomplish before we leave there.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the facts are as just stated, to which a ready acquiescence is yielded by the Senator from Nebraska, I ask what possible objection can there be to the Government of the United States saying why it is over there, what it intends to do, and what it expects to accomplish? The Senator rises as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and says he does not speak authoritatively or for the Government. I observe by the RECORD that when I was absent day before yesterday the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee [Mr. SWANSON] expressly disclaimed that he spoke authoritatively or for the Government. Why is it that our Government can not tell us why we are there, what we intend to do, and what our ultimate purposes are? If that were done, then, with some degree of intelligence, we might debate at least what the Government says to us.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, of course I realize that our form of government is not like the form of government they have in Great Britain, where the representative of the administration sitting in the legislative hall answers questions and makes authoritative statements, but I have endeavored to meet the Senator's request for information, and I think I have gone to a legitimate extent concerning the facts as they actually exist. I do not see how anyone can have any doubt in reviewing those facts that we went in there to fight Germany when the war was at its height; that the Germans were there ahead of us; that the Bolsheviki had thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of men on the ground who were being released from prison under German influence; that those men were getting arms; that they were going to seize Vladivostok; that they were going to seize other harbors in Russia; and that they were going to use Russia as a military base. We were justified in connection with the other countries with which we are cooperating in going in there.

There will be a time when we will have to come out. We evidently did not go in there as conquerors of Russia. I have endeavored to set forth that the result of our presence there has been that over a distance of 5,000 miles, a whole empire, our people have been received in a friendly manner and are acting in cooperation with the Russian local government.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. I listened to the Senator's statement a moment ago relative to the number of British and French troops operating in the neighborhood of Archangel. My information is—and this information was as of November 10, given to me by a naval officer who had returned from Archangel—that on that date we had something in the neighborhood of 2,000 troops there, and that France and England each had less troops than we had in that country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no warrant for speaking as to the French and the British, but I have warrant for saying that we have 10,200 troops at Vladivostok, and that we landed about 5,000 troops at Archangel for use there and on the Murman coast.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether the Senator has the information or not, and I do not know whether he would feel authorized to give it if he had it, but an interesting situation is presented by reason of the fact that Japan is withdrawing her troops. Can the Senator tell why it is that Japan, with whom we entered Russia, feels that the situation is such that she may properly withdraw her troops?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have some knowledge that I do not know that I am justified in giving. Japan landed a much larger body of troops than we had expected would be landed, a body of troops larger than we thought was necessary to be landed. I say "we," I mean the administration. I do not know what influences are now inducing Japan to reduce those numbers so that they will conform more nearly with the number of men that we landed; but that is the fact the number is being reduced; and the very fact that it is being reduced shows that there is no great danger there from the Russian people; that they are in a friendly country, and feel safe with a much smaller body of troops than they went in with.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the fact, Mr. President, that it is pretty generally understood, as nearly as we can understand anything in regard to the situation, that the small number of American troops in Russia are pretty hard pressed and are in great danger not only from weather and disease, but from being so surrounded as that they may never get out at all, I hardly suppose that our Government requested that the forces there, from whatever source they were supplied, should be reduced.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The men at Archangel are not hard pressed. The fighting has ceased there, and has ceased for months. There is order there. There is merely an army of occupation. The only fighting that is going on now is along the Murman coast and above Archangel, on the river; and the fighting there has evidently been grossly exaggerated in the newspaper reports, because we have, under date of January 4, a report by cable from that point that the total number of men killed in battle since we landed there is only 126; so the mortality indicates that the fighting is not of a very desperate character.

Mr. BORAH. Are there no Japanese troops in the near vicinity of the place where the fighting has been going on?

Mr. NELSON. No; there are none there. They are all on the Siberian Railroad.

Mr. BORAH. How long would it take them to get from the point where the fighting has not been to the point where the fighting is going on?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Japanese are not near the scene of the fighting. They are only an army of occupation and support. They are keeping open the trans-Siberian line. They entered by way of Vladivostok, and, of course, they are not on the Murman coast, nor near Archangel. They are 800 miles from that point.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The farthest west that the Japanese have gotten is a point near Irkutsk, and from there over to where our troops are, south of Archangel, is probably from 500 to 700 miles. You have to go west on the Siberian Railroad, beyond Perm, in the Ural Mountains, and then west of that—I do not remember the name of the station—is a station where the railroad runs up to Archangel. The Japanese have not been within, I think it can safely be said, five or six thousand miles of our forces in Archangel.

Mr. BORAH. I understand there are no Japanese, then, at points where the fighting has been going on?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my impression. That is, there was some fighting immediately upon their landing at Vladivostok. That fighting was largely with German-officered Bolsheviki—Germans who had been released from camps in Siberia near Vladivostok, some 50,000 in number—and the fighting occurred there months ago and has not been repeated for months.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me a minute there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The situation is this: Our troops are in and about Vladivostok on the east. The Japanese have gotten as far west as Irkutsk, the capital of trans-Baikalia, near Lake Baikal. The Czecho-Slovaks, with the aid of Russians and a naval officer whose name I can not pronounce, have advanced along the Siberian Railroad as far as Omsk, the capital of western Siberia; and their latest report is that they have advanced as far as Perm, the principal point in eastern European Russia west of the Ural Mountains. They are advancing in that direction, and there has been no particular fighting. The only fighting that the American troops have had anything to do with is in the country south of Archangel; and if Senators will study the geography of the country they will find that that country to the south from the Murman coast and the Kola Peninsula and from Archangel, at the south of the White Sea, is a swampy, timbered country, thinly and sparsely settled, and there are no great towns and no great villages in that country. As the Senator from Nebraska has well said, the troops have just advanced along that line, which runs at right angles to the Siberian line, far enough south to protect their base and the country they have gone into. There may be a few scattered villages; but close to that country in northern Russia, south of the Kola Peninsula and south of the White Sea, is a wilderness of swamps and timber and all kinds of country, very sparsely settled. It does not include what may be called the agricultural or civilized, developed portions of Russia.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion there? My information is that during the summer of 1917 allied troops, including American troops and some Russians, anti-Bolshevists, advanced a short distance south of Archangel for the purpose of establishing, if it became necessary, winter quarters, and they erected some structures. The Bolshevists later on made an advance and captured some of the buildings which had been erected. As I understand, there has been some fighting between the allies and American forces in their efforts to regain and hold against the Bolshevists these buildings and outposts, constituting in part their winter quarters.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I am taking the time of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I want to propound one more interrogatory to the Senator from Nebraska, if I may, and then I will cease.

Day before yesterday, or day before that, I observed a press dispatch—I am entirely skeptical of press dispatches about Russia—but, nevertheless, this one said that England had determined to withdraw her troops from Russia. The Senator may have observed it as well. I ask whether or not he can enlighten us on that subject, whether it is a fact or whether it is not a fact?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no knowledge as to what the intentions of the British Government are in this respect.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator probably observed the press dispatch.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I noticed something to that effect. I presume that all the troops are coming out of Russia. It is merely a matter of time when that will be done.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just one minute——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In reply to the Senator from California, I should like to state that Lord Milner, who has been looking after the Russian military situation for Great Britain, gave out a statement in which quite the contrary appears, although he states in conclusion——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That was some weeks ago, though, if the Senator will observe.

Mr. KING. No; December 18.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; but this dispatch was within the last three days, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I saw that dispatch, but I have also seen it contradicted.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska, since inquiries have been made regarding the purpose of the President in Russia, that the President, in the sixth of his 14 points which have been agreed to for the making of peace, has a specific declaration in reference to Russia, which I should like at this time to read. First:

The evacuation of all Russian territory.

That has been agreed to, and that is one of the conditions of peace.

Mr. KING. It has been agreed to by Germany.

Mr. SWANSON. The evacuation of all Russian territory by the peoples who have agreed to it; I mean, ultimately, when the time comes for peace, when peace is made.

Second—

Such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, may I call to the Senator's attention the fact that the sixth term of peace that he reads is the sixth term of peace with Germany, not with Russia?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will remember, this is a condition upon which the allies, including France and England, agreed to make peace with Germany and Austria and among themselves; and, as I understand, this is intended as a settlement of this great world war.

Further permit me to say the sixth of the 14 items continues:

And, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire.

But it goes farther than that to warn other nations that they have no right to despoil Russia, and that the test of their fairness will be their treatment of Russia. On that point the President says:

The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

It seems to me that the sixth of the conditions upon which peace will be made with Germany assures to Russia no spoliation of her territory.

Mr. BORAH. That does not throw any light at all upon what our troops are at the present time doing in Russia. Do we understand that they are to remain until the 14 points are established?

Mr. SWANSON. It throws this light on it absolutely: That they went there for correct purposes; that they are not there for any improper purpose, as has been intimated. It shows clearly that the President, when these troops were sent there, sent them there under that condition, as far as he had power to pledge this country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at the time the President delivered that address covering the 14 points the President had a policy with reference to Russia which, in my humble judgment, was a very correct policy. The President, however, through the persuasions of others, modified that policy afterwards. I have reason to believe that he modified it with a great deal of reluctance, and it is with the modification now that we are dealing and not with the policy which the President originally outlined and which, in my judgment, had he been permitted to do so, he would have followed.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to reply to the Senator, I will say that I understand that there has been no modification of the ultimate policy with reference to Russia. Conditions arose, after the collapse of Russia, in which it was necessary to hold these two places for warlike purposes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at the time the President made that address he had nothing in view in the way of sending troops into Russia, and it was some time before he consented to it.

Mr. SWANSON. But—if the Senator will permit me, and then I will not interrupt further—in his address to Germany and to the allies transmitting the communications of Germany, this treatment of Russia is reiterated as one of the 14 articles of the basis upon which peace is to be made. This is what he has pledged as a basis of peace, as one of the 14 points upon which the world shall make peace.

Mr. BORAH. And with which I thoroughly agree so far as Russia is concerned. But we are not in Russia to establish the 14 points, I suspect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think there is another answer to the point made by the Senator from Idaho, and that is that an authoritative statement was given out by the State Department at the time our troops were sent to Russia, and that statement was given wide publicity at the time, and with the consent of the Senator I will read a paragraph of it:

As the Government of the United States sees the present circumstances, therefore, military action is admissible in Russia now only to render such protection and help as is possible to the Czecho-Slovaks against the armed Austrian and German prisoners who are attacking them and to steady any efforts at self-government or self-defense in which the Russians themselves may be willing to accept assistance. Whether from Vladivostok or from Murmansk and Archangel, the only present object for which American troops will be employed will be to guard military stores which may subsequently be needed by Russian forces and to render such aid as may be acceptable to the Russians in the organization of their own self-defense.

I have already recited how eminently welcome these American troops have been. They are cooperating with the local governments of the people, the soviets, not only in Vladivostok but from Vladivostok to the Ural Mountains—5,000 miles. It can not be said under those circumstances that we have sent in those troops to fight Russia, when they are welcomed by these soviets and are cooperating with the forces that up to very recently were fighting Germany.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that when the Government of the United States and the allies learned that there were 300,000 or more German and Austrian prisoners between a point perhaps four hundred or a thousand miles west of Lake Baikal and Vladivostok, many of whom were in the vicinity of Vladivostok, that they were being released and armed by the Bolsheviks, so far as the Bolsheviks could arm them, for the purpose of utilizing them to fight not only Japan but the United States and the allied Governments, and keeping in mind the further fact that there were 50,000 Czecho-Slovaks fighting battles for the same cause that the allies were fighting for, there was no obligation resting upon the allied Governments and the United States to try to protect the Czecho-Slovaks and at the same time to prevent the 300,000 liberated prisoners being molded into an instrumentality for use against the allied forces?

Mr. BORAH. I take it that the Senator from Utah is stating his own view, because the Senator from Idaho has made no suggestion from which such a suggestion could be drawn. I have not criticized the sending of troops into Russia in the first instance. I assumed that when it was done it was done in order to carry out the view of Gen. Foch with reference to taking care of the military situation, and I, therefore, was naturally not disposed to question it; and I do not now question the wisdom of having them sent there at that time. I simply say that at the present time I am unable to understand why the fighting should be continued under present conditions. That has nothing to do with the original sending of the men over there. That was, we will assume, the proper thing to do; but they are there now, and they have apparently engaged in conflict and are marching to some destination—the particular destination is unknown—having in view some object or purpose, which object or purpose we do not know.

Now, if it is distinctly understood here to-day that the American troops are in Russia at the present time performing no duties other than those of protecting those stores and those provisions which they went there to protect, so far as I am concerned I have no criticism to offer; but if the facts which are published coming from Russia be true, it is a most peculiar and extraordinary way which they have of protecting those stores. They are apparently marching inland, or fighting their way inland, for a reason which is not made plain even by the very able statement of the Senator from Nebraska.

If, however, the Senator from Nebraska states and the Senator from Utah states that the sole and only purpose or object which those troops have there at the present time is to protect those stores in an intelligent way, then, so far as I am concerned, I have no criticism to offer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KING. I can assure the Senator, so far as I have obtained information—and I have inquired of the State Department and various sources where information can be obtained—that there is no present purpose upon the part of the allied governments to make any further advancement southerly from the Murman coast or from Archangel than was made for the protection of the supplies and their base of operations. There were, as I suggested to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] a few moments ago, some outposts or winter quarters provided in anticipation that the troops might have to remain in northern Russia during the winter months and at some distance south of Archangel, but only at such points as were necessary for the protection of their base of operations. Some of the Bolsheviks invaded the winter quarters some time ago; and it is merely for the purpose, as I am advised, of maintaining their position and rendering their base of operations secure that a slight advance was made, with a view to recapturing the outposts taken by the Bolsheviks. This constitutes the attacks, as they are called, to which the press refers. The American troops, as well as the allied forces, are acting merely defensively and not offensively.

But, speaking for myself, I regret that the allied Governments—and I include the United States in the words "allied Governments"—have not taken in the past stronger measures for the purpose of protecting Russia as well as themselves, and in order that they might wall in the Bolshevik murderers and madmen, so that the fires which they are lighting in Europe might not spread into Germany and other European lands and undo much that has been accomplished by the allied Governments. I believe that if the allied Governments had sent into Russia in June and July of last year fifty or one hundred thousand troops and given heart to the Russians and to the Czecho-Slovaks the Bolsheviki would have been overcome before this time, and the Russian people would have had an opportunity to organize a government that would have afforded them protection and been an agency under which they could have worked out their destiny and salvation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I have not yielded the floor. Does the Senator desire to ask me a question?

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield for that purpose?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. From what the Senator from Utah stated just before taking his seat, I am led to the conclusion—I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—that the policy to be pursued in Russia from now on is so purely defensive that the Czecho-Slovaks will be abandoned to their fate. Is that the situation?

Mr. KING. I am afraid that is the situation, although I would not want to state that definitely. With respect to the northern part of Russia that is my information; that is, that a defensive course only will be pursued. I sincerely hope the allied governments will not abandon the Czecho-Slovaks. I think it would be an act of cowardice. I can not find a strong enough term to characterize an act of such infamy and cowardice.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to be considered as advocating the abandonment of any nation, great or small, that could have been considered as an allied power in this conflict. The only thing that has confused me with reference to this situation was how we were going to accomplish anything other than the physical fact of the protection of stores by our military forces in Russia.

I do not agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that you can deal with the Bolsheviki situation in a military way. It is one of those things that, in my judgment, can not be controlled by outside military force. In the first place, I should think it would be very confusing for a man in Russia to be able to distinguish upon all occasions a Bolshevik from a Russian. It is easy enough here in the Senate to speak of the Russians and the Bolsheviki, but if I were going out to kill a Bolshevik, in all probability I would kill just as many Russians as Bolsheviks. I would not be able to distinguish the Russians which were Bolsheviks and those which were not.

We are dealing with a situation in which nothing can be achieved from a military standpoint. On the other hand, no one knows to what extent what is called the Bolshevik government is accepted by the Russian people.

The trouble is, Mr. President, that we can not get the real facts. The people who come from Russia, who have seen, and have recorded in their own way the facts with reference to that country are not permitted to tell the story. Men have come back from Russia who have spent months in that country, who have a feeling that we do not understand the situation; that all the facts with reference to the soviet government have not been given; that the Russian people very largely support the soviet government; but they are not permitted to state the facts to the American people. Therefore it is almost impossible to deal with the situation here. We do not know to what extent the soviet government represents the Russian people. I take the position that the Russian people have the same right to establish a socialistic state as we have to establish a Republic.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will not call the soviet government or the Bolshevik government a socialistic government. While I have no sympathy with socialism, socialism, as I understand the term, is as far above Bolshevism as the heavens are above the earth. Bolshevism is madness and destruction, it is murder and assassination. It is a negation of everything. Socialism does speak for order. I am speaking of purified socialism, such as——

Mr. BORAH. You are giving your kind of socialism?

Mr. KING. No; I am speaking of what might be denominated orthodox or true socialism, the creed of Marx, and what has been called the purified socialism of Schaffle. I do not have in mind the teachings of Berger or those who under the guise of socialism have attempted to destroy government, and who have been traitors to our country in its war against Germany. Genuine, orthodox socialism does have some merit; but Bolshevism stands out condemned by God, and man, and even by hell itself.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho is not familiar with that region. He has no communication with it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator knows anything about Bolshevism, he has.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I know how earnestly the Senator from Utah feels about the matter. If he will confine his idea of Bolshevism to Lenine and Trotsky I will agree with him. I think they are disloyal to every one on earth except themselves. I have no doubt they went into that country through the influence and protection and as corrupt representatives of the German Government. But I disassociate those two men and the few men who surround and support them from the great body and mass of Russian people. Even though those people be supporting them in a measure at this time, even though they recognize them as leaders at this time, I believe you can not bring an indictment against the whole people. There is a vast amount of good in the Russian people which may be properly organized and brought into order, and a sane and stable government be established. I am not willing to place, in other words, the standard which Lenine and Trotsky have raised as the standard which represents the intelligence or the capacity of the Russian people. I have great faith that they are yet to prove that they are the worthy and estimable people we have always believed them to be.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it the Senator's theory that we should reorganize the Russian Government and establish a government there according to our ideas?

Mr. BORAH. No, sir. I do not want this Government to go into Europe to set up governments.

Mr. KIRBY. Should we overthrow the Government that they are recognizing as authoritative? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator desires to know my exact position, I want to get out of Russia and let Russia settle her own affairs, so far as military intervention is concerned, just as soon as we can do so, with due deference to the military situation which has been superinduced by this war. If we ever go into Russia to set up a government by force we will leave millions of our boys in nameless graves, bankrupt our Treasury, and in the end come out something as Napoleon did.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator know how many hundreds of thousands of Germans are still left in what was formerly Russia, and how many there are in Russia to-day through whose influence was probably brought about the condition that exists and has been made possible?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know how many are there. I have no doubt a number are there, and they are doing the same thing in Russia that they are now doing in Germany. They are superinducing and bringing on chaos. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will thank the Senator to permit me to make just one other suggestion. It was one of the 14 principles, as I conceive it, that the Germans should leave Russia and all other invaded territory under the terms of the armistice, and can we shift all the responsibility by saying that she can turn loose half a million Germans in Russia for the purpose of running amuck in the world as bad as she did when she started the war?

Mr. BORAH. That brings up another proposition. If that is the reason for our being there, if we believe that Germany has such a hold upon Russia that we must deal with Germany through the Russian territory, does anybody expect to whip Germany in Russia with 5,000 or 10,000 troops? That is the difficulty of the whole situation. If we have a task there to perform, we have no one with whom to perform it; but the poor fellows who are there are suffering and dying without any particular object in view and without any hope of accomplishing anything.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator if he has formed any conclusion from his investigation of this matter as to who is responsible for this situation, particularly as to whether this action in Russia on the one hand and inaction on the other, this indecisive course of proceeding, is due to any law of Congress, and if not, to what is it due? Who directed it and who is responsible to the American people for it?

Mr. BORAH. As I said a few moments ago, I understood from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that they were sent over to protect certain stores and certain bases, under the direction and order of Gen. Foch, and with that I have no fault to find. It was a part of the military strategy of the war.

They desired to organize an eastern front and to bring about a condition which would compel the Germans to divide their forces. Certainly I would be far from criticizing that course. That has nothing to do with the present situation, however, because we have ceased fighting in Germany. We are at peace with Germany. The treaty has not been signed, but we are no longer fighting, although we are killing these people in Russia. That is confusing to a man who has no more information to-day than I have.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I notice that the press dispatches, with apparent reliability, state that the British and French Governments have been endeavoring to secure from the United States some declaration of policy in regard to what the United States is going to do in Russia, and stating that their view is that we apparently have no policy at all.

Mr. BORAH. And they have not, either.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, but they have. According to these dispatches they have a policy in regard to Russia and have been endeavoring to cooperate with the United States. I am only basing my statement upon public press dispatches, but I noticed, following upon the statement that they were unable to get any declaration of policy from the United States, a statement from the Government of Great Britain, made to the soldiers of their returning armies who desired to be demobilized and who are opposed to the beginning of what they term a new war, that the British Government will not send any additional troops to Russia, which, of course, means that as soon as possible they are going to bring out of Russia those they have already sent there. They seem to have a definite policy, but the dispatches coming from those Governments are to the effect that they have been unable to ascertain from the United States what we propose to do.

Mr. BORAH. The dispatches of which the Senator speaks did not seem to me to outline any policy upon the part of our allies; but here is where the difficulty arises: There is now being considered this policy or this program as to whether or not we will go into Russia and undertake to restore order and establish a stable government by force or whether we will simply confine our activities to the protection of the stores and to the stabilizing of the situation so as to protect whatever property we have there. The former proposition of going into Russia and establishing a sane and stable government, of interfering in the internal affairs of Russia, is one thing to which I would not, if I were consulted, give my consent.

The reason why, in my judgment, the able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and others are so much interested in this subject is because we are of the opinion that there is no disposition to limit these activities to the mere question of protecting the military situation which is brought on by reason of the war, but there is a disposition to go there and, as a very distinguished ex-President still living said, "shoot Bolshevism out of Russia."

In 1791 Mr. Pitt, of England, thought that they could shoot the revolutionary spirit out of France, and Edmund Burke figured that they could strangle it. Both of those distinguished statesmen were in favor of dealing with it purely from the military standpoint. They denounced it in terms scarcely less graphic or less pointed than the able Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] uses in his denunciation of Bolshevism. They said it was spreading the world over and would destroy all the stable governments. But they could not put it down by force. In their own fearful way the French people finally settled the matter among themselves and established through long years a Republic. It is worth all it cost. It has stood for four bloody years between civilization and barbarism. Robespierre and Marat were vicious and brutal, but the French people were a noble people. Whatever we think of Lenine and Trotsky, the Russian people are a noble people, and I venture to hope that even in travail and anguish they, too, will work out their salvation. If we are going to help the Russian people, let us not delude ourselves that we can help them by force of arms. Have we caught the Prussian disease, that we can think of nothing but force?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that I read an interesting article a day or two ago in one of the newspapers—I can not now recall what paper it was—which suggested that one of the main reasons now for entering with our military forces into Russia was the appointment of a receiver for that Government in order that Great Britain, the United States, and France might collect about $10,000,000,000 of claims held against the Russian Government and the Russian people.

Mr. NELSON obtained the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES FOR THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Out of order, I ask unanimous consent to submit a concurrent resolution and that it be read and properly referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 28) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Sunday, the 9th day of February, 1919, be set aside as the day upon which there shall be held a joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives for appropriate exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public service of the late Theodore Roosevelt, former President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

That a joint committee, to consist of five Senators and seven Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, shall be named, with full power to make all arrangements and publish a suitable program for the joint session of Congress herein authorized, and to issue the invitations hereinafter mentioned.

That invitations shall be extended to the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and such other invitations shall be issued as to the said committee shall seem best.

That all expenses incurred by the committee in the execution of the provisions of this resolution shall be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I have already polled the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate upon the concurrent resolution, and I am authorized to report it favorably and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. The unfinished business has already been laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was formally laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I propose briefly to discuss the Russian situation from an impersonal point of view. In order that we may understand exactly what it is, I shall go back and partially trace the history of the war and of the two revolutions that have occurred in Russia.

The question is asked, Why have we not helped Russia, and why do we not help her now with military forces, in conjunction with the allies, to establish law and order and a stable government?

To answer this question properly it is necessary to point out in what condition the war with Germany left Russia, to point out her present condition and what has already been done for her relief, and to briefly outline how and in what manner regeneration must come to her.

Russia entered the great war in August, 1914, apparently with a whole heart and united purpose, both on the part of the Government and the people. During the continuance of the war she scored great successes and sad failures, and it was apparent that the failures came, in the main, not from any lack of fighting ability on the part of the officers and men of her armies but from the neglect of those in high authority, who had the power, but not the will, to furnish the armies with the necessary supplies of food, ammunition, and equipment.

Germany carried on a double system of warfare against Russia—one by her trained armies in the field, the other by an army of spies and emissaries of bribery and corruption. She found an ample field for these spies and emissaries among the radical socialists and the remnants of the old nihilists; but beyond this, and fully as dangerous, was the disguised treachery that prevailed in the purlieus and environment of the court, and among some of the higher officials of German origin, and whose sympathies were with Germany.

The Czar was a weakling, the Czarina was a German, and both came under the sinister influence of the Monk Rasputin, who was evidently a tool of Germany, and aided in carrying on the German propaganda for the termination of the war and a separate peace.

One of the methods pursued by the plotters was to tighten the strings of autocracy so that they might the more easily break. At the direct instance of Prime Minister Goremykin, the Czar was induced to prorogue the Duma—the Russian Congress—at a time when this body was loyally supporting the war and was only asking for a responsible ministry and an amnesty for political offenders.

Proroguing the Duma led to the resignation of Goremykin, but he was succeeded by Boris Sturmer, a man of German blood and sympathy and a friend and associate of Rasputin. Sturmer soon began operations secretly and by roundabout methods to secure separate peace with Germany, and with this in view he brought about the removal of Sazonov, the minister of foreign affairs, a thorough friend of the allies, and he continued to still further tighten the strings of autocracy and to pursue his peace propaganda by securing the appointment of Protopopoff as minister of the interior. Shortly after this Sturmer, on account of corruption in office, was forced to resign, and he in turn was succeeded by Trepov, who was a weak man and never cut much of a figure.

The controlling spirit in the ministry after Sturmer was the minister of the interior, Protopopoff, who began an insidious campaign by drastic means to foment trouble and disturbance and to bring on a revolution for the purpose of furthering his sinister peace program. The Czarina and Rasputin were in league with him and held the poor Czar in their toils.

In the meantime the baleful influence of Rasputin had become so pronounced and acute that it was deemed necessary, by those who were really friendly to the Czar and hostile to the German influence and propaganda, to do away with him once for all, and he was accordingly lured to the house of a member of the royal family and there killed at the instance of a group of men who had assembled there for that purpose. His body was put under the ice in the River Neva, but was afterwards recovered. All this proved a great shock to the Czarina, Protopopoff, and the other members of the court who were friendly to Germany, and the remains of Rasputin were in fact given a quasi royal funeral.

It was hoped that the German influence with the court and Government would subside with the death of Rasputin, but the German intrigues continued, and Protopopoff seemed to step into the shoes of Rasputin, and proceeded to remove from the Government all those who were not friendly to Germany. Through his secret agents he fomented strikes and then proceeded to arrest the labor leaders, who were preaching and working against strikes. Then he halted and retarded the trains that were bringing food supplies to Petrograd to such an extent that not only the workmen but the troops suffered for want of food. He wanted dire distress to prevail in order to make it easier to come to terms with Germany to end the war and to secure peace; but his methods and his work brought on the upheaval and revolution of March, 1917, which led to the abdication of the Czar and the establishment of the Kerensky Government.

Up to this time the war against Germany had proceeded with varied successes and failures, but I will not weary you with any details of this. It is sufficient to say that aside from the bad generalship of the Tannenberg campaign, the Russians were, in the main, successful when they were provided with ample supplies of food, ammunition, and equipment. It was only where these failed that the Russians were forced to retreat, with empty guns and cannon, coupled with a lack of food. This failure to supply the army with food and ammunition was a part of the baleful and sinister German propaganda, participated in and promoted by high officials of the Russian Government.

The Russian officers and soldiers were brave men, and their heart was in the war, but they could not stem the tide of invasion with empty stomachs and empty rifles. Their heroic retreat, under these conditions, can not but meet with our sympathy and admiration for their valor and endurance.

One of the first acts of the Kerensky government was to pardon all political offenders at home and abroad. This brought Lenine from Siberia and Trotzky from the United States, to whom I shall refer later.

The Kerensky government proceeded to carry on the war, and at first was partly successful, but soon found itself handicapped by a spirit of the most radical socialism, which not only possessed the workmen and peasants but had also entered the ranks of the army to such an extent that the rank and file insisted on the right to remove and appoint their officers, high and low. This, of course, would inevitably lead to the disintegration of the army.

Nikolai Lenine, whose real name is Vladimir Utulyanov, had returned from Siberia by way of Switzerland and Germany in April, 1917, and at once proceeded to denounce the provisional government of Kerensky and the allies and to advocate a separate and immediate peace. He was through and through of the most radical order of socialists, and he no doubt obtained his cue in Germany on his way from Switzerland. He had an aggressive helper and coadjutor in Leon Trotzky, whose real name is Leber Braumstein and who had returned from America, where he had resided for some time and was known as a most radical and extreme socialist. The agitation of these two and that of their associates so affected the army that the Russian soldiers began to fraternize with the enemy soldiers, to desert, and to leave for home, and even in time of battle refuse to fight and go over to the enemy. This brought on a collapse of the war.

In the meantime Germany and Austria continued to vigorously prosecute the war and to press the Russian Army farther and farther back—back to a line running from Riga by way of Smorgon, Pinsk, Lutsk, Tarnopal, Czernowitz to Galatz, near the mouth of the Danube.

While the Russian armies were being pressed farther and farther back for lack of leaders and of a warlike spirit, Lenine and Trotzky and their associates and followers, who had assumed or acquired the name of "Bolsheviki," vigorously pursued their peace propaganda, and with that end in view sought to undermine and destroy the Kerensky government. In this they were soon successful, and in November, 1917, the Kerensky government was overthrown and was succeeded by a Bolsheviki Government under the lead of Lenine and Trotzky, who announced their program, through Trotzky to a representative of the Associated Press, to be, among other matters, an offer of an immediate armistice on all fronts for the conclusion of a democratic peace, transfer of all lands to the peasants, State control of industries, and delivery of all authority to local soldiers and workingmen's deputies. Lenine further announced that he and his government were for immediate peace without annexation and without indemnities.

Trotsky in the meantime sought to get the allies to join him in his armistice and peace propaganda. In this he, of course, failed.

During these maneuvers on the part of Lenine and Trotzky there had been a 10 days' suspension of hostilities. This was succeeded by an armistice to extend from December 17, 1917, until January 14, 1918. In the meantime sinister negotiations continued between the Bolsheviki government and the representatives of Germany and Austria, but I will not weary you with the details of these. It is sufficient to state that they all culminated in the treaty of Brest-Litovsk.

Before calling your attention to some of the provisions of this treaty, I will bring your attention to some other important matters which serve to explain some of the provisions of this treaty.

During this period of revolutions and the collapse of the war, Germany had embarked on a plan of establishing a kingdom of Finland, with a German prince as king, and she had also been instrumental in bringing forth and nursing a so-called Ukraine republic, to be independent of Russia. This last-mentioned scheme was the most sinister, and would prove the most destructive to the future welfare of Russia.

The proposed Ukraine nation or republic was to include 17 Provinces of Russia lying north of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov, and watered by the Rivers Dneister, Dneiper, Don, and their tributaries. It embraces an area of over 300,000 square miles and constitutes the best agricultural portion of European Russia, the famous black belt. It is also the home and the heart of the great Slavic race. To deprive Russia of this vast and rich domain would be to wrench her very vitals from her, and render impotent and abortive her future rehabilitation.

In addition to these matters, Germany was also nursing a scheme to cut off the Baltic Provinces of Russia, namely, Courland, Livonia, Esthonia, and Lithuania, with a view of establishing some kind of independent governments for them or perhaps, which is more probable, of ultimately absorbing them into the German Empire.

Peace negotiations were opened at Brest-Litovsk, between the Bolsheviki government of Lenine and Trotzky on the one part and Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey on the other part in December, 1917, but were postponed and continued on various grounds until March 3, 1918, when the final treaty was signed, which was afterwards accepted by the so-called Pan Soviet Congress at Moscow on March 14, 1918. By this treaty Russia was divested of Finland, Esthonia, Livonia, Courland, Lithuania, Poland, Ukraine, and Russian Armenia. In short, her northern, southern, southeastern, and western borders were all stripped. She was cut off from the Black Sea, with a mere look-in at the easternmost end of the Gulf of Finland, and remitted for sea outlets to Vladivostok, Archangel, and the Kola Peninsula. The greater and most serious of these territorial losses, the Ukraine, seems to have been cheerfully acquiesced in by the Bolsheviki representatives.

When Chairman Kuhlman at the peace conference inquired of Trotzky whether he and his associates desired to represent diplomatically Russia as a whole, Trotzky replied:

> Being informed of the note of the general secretary of the Ukrainian people's Republic, which has been communicated by the Ukrainian delegation, the Russia delegation, for its part, declares that, acting in full recognition of the principles of the right of self-definition for every nation, it finds no objection to the participation of the Ukrainian delegation in the peace negotiations, even if this should involve the complete secession of the latter from Russia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator's preceding sentence to indicate that the Bolshevists cheerfully consented to a dismemberment of Ukraine from Russia and the setting up under self-determination of an independent government. Is it not a fact, however, that later the Bolshevists attempted, and are now attempting, to destroy all forms of government and of order in the Ukraine, the same as they are trying to destroy it in Esthonia, in Courland, or in Finland, and indicate that they are going to invade the entire world and destroy government wherever it does exist?

Mr. NELSON. I have not any doubt about that.

In the light of and inspired by this suggestion, which I have just quoted of Trotzky, a separate treaty was made with the Ukraine representatives who were in attendance at the peace treaty. I need not go into other details of the Russian treaty of Brest-Litovsk than to say that it bears the clear earmarks of the fact that Trotzky and Lenine and the other leaders of the Bolsheviki government were wholly oblivious to the welfare and best interests of Russia and were evidently the conscious tools of Germany. In any event the most charitable view that can be taken of their conduct is that they were so eager to establish a most radical and thorough socialistic state that they were willing to sacrifice all other vital essentials and interests for that purpose. If they were not financially corrupt, they were certainly morally and mentally corrupt, and poor Russia was the main sufferer and chief victim.

The peace propaganda of Germany in Russia has proved more fatal than her war propaganda. The germ of Bolshevikism was imported and, in the first instance, insidiously nursed and spread by Germany. The strife on the battle field has long since ceased, but the strife engendered by the invasion of spies and emissaries of treachery, fraud, and corruption is still rampant and a festering sore.

Conditions are still chaotic and mob rule seems still rampant. Russia has had and still needs relief and help, and the allies have already done much to help her. First and foremost of all they have vanquished and brought to her knees the enemy of Russia, and that common enemy of the civilized world—Germany—and through that has relieved Russia from the burden of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, which is now a dead letter; and the large quantity of gold money taken by Germany from Russia has been recovered by the allies, and is held by them in trust for the Russian people. They have opened to her the ports of the Black Sea and given her an outlet to the Mediterranean and have recovered for her from the enemy her fleet in that sea.

With Odessa and Sevastopol and the shores of the Black Sea in control of the allies, the people of the Ukraine will soon see the folly of separating from the rest of Russia, and the Ukraine Republic, breathed into life by Germany, will soon be a mere saga.

The ports on the Baltic and the Gulf of Finland, namely, Riga, Pernau, Reval, Kronstadt, Helsingfors, and the Aland Islands, are fast being cleared of the enemy, and the interned Russian fleet in those waters will soon be recovered, and the German fleet will no longer be a menace. The port of Vladivostok, on the Pacific; the port of Arkangel, on the White Sea; and the port of Alexandria, on the Murman coast; and the Kola Peninsula, with all the shipping supplies and ammunition in those ports, have been saved and conserved for the benefit of the Russian people.

On the west—as a shield against Germany—a new Poland is fast rising from the turmoils and afflictions of the past, to regain the place she once held among the nations of the Old World, with a port at Danzig or Konigsberg giving her an outlet to the sea.

All these matters which I have thus briefly enumerated have been and will be of great help for the restoration and regeneration of Russia; but regeneration must come from within and not through the sword of an outsider, however friendly he may be.

Already the anti-Bolshiviki elements have obtained control of nearly all of Siberia and the Siberian railroads as far west as Omsk in western Siberia, and by the very latest accounts as far west as Perm, across the Ural Mountains in the eastern part of European Russia.

In the Ukraine, the Bolsheviki are fast losing their grip, and I think from there and from Siberia will come the elements and forces that will ultimately vanquish the Bolsheviki government and bring order out of chaos.

The Bolsheviki government can no longer lean upon Germany or receive material support from there, and all the civilized world is opposed to the system and methods of this government. It will be an Ishmaelite among the enlightened nations of the world, and soon the mass of the Russian people will become weary and sigh and labor for something better.

I have great faith in the recuperative vitality of the Russian people. They have always, in the past, succeeded in recovering themselves from what seemed hopeless adversity and chaos. I have acquired this faith from scanning the past history of the race.

The origin of the Slav race is somewhat obscure. When first known to history, the Russian Slavs, consisting of several tribes, occupied the territory extending from the region of the lower Danube, thence northward along the Rivers Dniester and Dnieper to Lake Ladoga on the north.

There was much strife among the various tribes, and finally in the ninth century some of the leading northern tribes invited Ruric, a Scandinavian chief, who with his followers had previously invaded the country from the north by way of the Neva and Lake Ladoga, to come to rule and lead them. He came, and under him and his successors the several tribes gradually coalesced and expanded their possessions in a northerly, easterly, and southeasterly direction and assumed the form of a nation and a homogeneous people.

Novgorod, on the River Volkhov, north of Lake Ilmen, was the first capital. From there Ruric and his successors proceeded southward to Smolensk and Kiev, and the latter place became for a while the capital of the embryo State, but Moscow ultimately became the seat of the Empire.

Christianity as well as culture came to them from the Grecks of the Byzantine Empire at Constantinople.

Many vicissitudes and many drawbacks were encountered by the new State, which, however, were gradually overcome; but the greatest calamity which befell the country was the great Mongol or Tartar invasion which began near the close of the thirteenth century and continued intermittently for upward of 200 years. During the confusion which ensued the chief band of cohesion was the church, which remained uncontaminated and was the chief rallying ground. The metropolitan had in the meantime transferred his see and seat to Moscow.

By the latter part of the fifteenth century the Tartar invasion had been stopped and ceased, and internal dissensions which had prevailed were suppressed and terminated, and Ivan the Third assumed the title of autocrat of all Russia and proceeded to consolidate and expand the Empire.

The Slav race had overcome the invasions, the vicissitudes, and the confusion of centuries and had emerged as a strong nation imbued with the spirit of expansion and growth.

Vassil the Third succeeded his father, Ivan the Third, and was succeeded by his son, Ivan the Fourth, known to history as Ivan the Terrible, who assumed the title of Tsar, and who, in many respects, was the greatest prince of the line of Ruric, and who further consolidated and enlarged the empire, extending it to the Ural Mountains and Caspian Sea. In his latter years the spirit of cruelty got the better of him and in a rage he killed his oldest son. He died in 1584, after a long reign, in which he had greatly enlarged, expanded, and consolidated his empire.

Three years before Ivan died the noted Yermak, at the head of his Cossacks, had entered upon the conquest of Siberia, which was pursued with such vigor by his successors that within 50 years thereafter the Russians had reached the shores of the Pacific at Kamchatka and Bering Strait and had, in the meantime, crossed three mighty rivers—the Ob, the Yenisei, the Lena, and their chief tributaries.

The death of Ivan brought on a collapse of the Government and the end of the rule of the line of Ruric. A period of disintegration, confusion, and chaos set in. Several pretenders appeared in the meantime and had many followers. The situation was more chaotic and more hopeless than it is to-day. For a time there was not even the semblance of a government of any kind, but finally, after the lapse of some 28 years of turmoil and confusion, the Russian people recovered themselves, and by the aid of the church placed Michael Romanoff on the throne, who succeeded, by the aid of the church and the better elements of the Russian people, in restoring law and order and in establishing a stable Government.

Under him and his successors the Russian Empire has continued to grow and expand into a mighty nation, although handicapped by its oriental origin and its lack of the general diffusion of knowledge. Serfdom, which had become established by custom and had retarded the progress of the Russian peasants, was finally abolished in the latter half of the nineteenth century, and Siberia and the shores of the Pacific were in the early part of this century united to European Russia by the great Siberian Railroad.

The descendants of Michael Romanoff continued at the head of the Russian Government until the revolution of 1917, to which I have already brought your attention.

I have thus briefly called your attention to and dwelt upon these two noted events in Russian history, namely, the Tartar invasion and the chaotic chasm which intervened between the extinction of the house of Ruric and the advent of the house of Romanoff, for the purpose of bringing your attention to the recuperative vitality of the Russian people.

A people who under such adverse conditions and drawbacks as then prevailed could thus recover themselves and expand and grow into a mighty empire have certainly the innate force, vigor, and vitality to restore order and to again establish a stable government.

The Bolsheviki government of Lenine and Trotsky without the aid of Germany, which it had when it was first launched, and without help or recognition from any outside source, and cut off from access to the sea at all points, can not long survive. It is based on false economic principles and is in the hands of treacherous, unscrupulous, and corrupt leaders. It is a moral excrescence which will inevitably slough off. The Russian people will soon by their own efforts come to their own. It will not be the old-time autocracy—they are scarcely fit for a republic—but a limited monarchy, with a legislature elected by manhood suffrage and a responsible ministry, after the pattern of England or the Scandinavian countries, would furnish them a stable government, suitable for their condition and their intelligence; and such a government, by the aid and encouragement of the allies, I believe they will establish in the near future, without the aid of outside military forces.

REPEAL OF ESPIONAGE ACT.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, this morning I introduced a bill to repeal the so-called espionage act and the act amendatory thereof, and I desire to submit a few observations upon that subject.

On the 3d day of last December the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], one of the ablest and stanchest champions in the Senate of free speech, of a free press, and of full publicity in connection with the business of the Government, introduced a bill to repeal that portion of the espionage act which empowers the Postmaster General to exercise his discretion as to publications which should be admitted to the United States mail. I find myself in entire sympathy with the measure offered by the Senator from Idaho; indeed, I had for some time contemplated introducing a bill to repeal this whole act. The enactment of the espionage law was, in my judgment, unnecessary, unjustifiable, unconstitutional, and a usurpation of power by the Congress under the direction of an executive department of the Government. The enactment of this legislation seemed to me at the time to be a direct affront to the people of this Republic.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that upon a number of occasions Congress has committed to the Postmaster General the discretion to exclude from the mails obscene matter, matter criminal in character, lottery matter, and so forth. Does the Senator think that committing to the Postmaster General the discretion to refuse the use of the mails to literature of that kind was unconstitutional?

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I have a great regard for the Senator from Utah, as he knows. I only desire to speak very briefly, but I shall endeavor in the remarks which I intend to present to make my opinion perfectly clear to everybody.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the answer just made is a full and fair reply to the question which I have propounded, and is it the only reply the Senator cares to make?

Mr. FRANCE. I think that the language of the Constitution is very clear, and I think it is beyond dispute that the States, in language as plain and definite as could be written, reserved to themselves the right to legislate with reference to the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say that when the enactment of such legislation as this is no longer resented by the American people, and when such a serious invasion of their inalienable rights shall not be summarily punished at a subsequent election by the repudiation of the party in power responsible for it, then, indeed, will the end of this great enterprise and experiment in free government upon this continent be not far distant.

The people of the United States bore this invasion of their rights with patience. It was not because of but in spite of such legislation as this that more than 20,000,000 of our people brought their savings, many of them taking upon themselves unaccustomed debts and obligations in order that they might buy the bonds, without which the preservation of our liberty would have been impossible. It was not because of but in spite of such legislation that there could scarcely be found within the confines of this great Republic a humble cottage or a stately mansion in which there did not hang a food-conservation card, a liberty bond emblem, a cross of red, or a black or golden star of unselfish service and of supreme sacrifice. I feel confident that there were many Members of the Congress who supported this legislation because under the extraordinary conditions they deemed it to be their duty, for the sake of harmony of action, to waive their own better judgment, even at the cost of following for a time a blind and reactionary leadership; but I fear that there were also those who voted for this legislation because they had lost faith in the Republic and in the love of the millions of our people for our country and their loyalty under all circumstances to her free institutions.

I was one of a small minority of Senators who voted against the passage of this espionage act. Minorities are generally mistaken. Surely, in view of the clear constitutional provision and of the extraordinary conditions which then prevailed, there was ample room for a legitimate difference of opinion. A large minority, made up chiefly of those on this side of the Chamber, contended for an amendment which would have assured the American people that, even after the enactment of this drastic law, they would be protected in their right to speak or publish "what is true, from good motives and for justifiable ends." But even this amendment, after it had been adopted once by the Senate, was stricken out upon what amounted to a peremptory order from an official in an executive department. But whatever room there might have been at the time this legislation was enacted for legitimate differences of opinion, I personally can not see how there should now be any difference between us as to the wisdom and, indeed, the necessity for its prompt repeal.

Now, as never before in our history, as we face momentous questions, and as we are approaching the time when we must consider treaties which may fix the obligations of our country to other nations for generations to come, are the absolute freedom of the press and fearlessness and freedom of speech and discussion indispensable.

I shall not now enter upon a prolonged discussion of this subject of a free press and of free speech. Yesterday a Nation stricken and bereaved mourned at the bier of him who had the courage of his convictions, whose heroic deeds made realities of his high ideals; and last night by many a hearthstone strong men and weeping women knelt down to pray that since Theodore Roosevelt's mighty spirit has been summoned to a higher sphere there may be raised up new champions to plead with his fearlessness and power for the restoration of the people's rights as against this tyrannical executive oligarchy which we, with the best of motives, have permitted to usurp them.

If there be any timorous one, I would commend to him the immortal words of the Areopagitica of Milton:

> Though all the windes of doctrin were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field we do injuriously by Licencing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple; whoever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? What a collusion is this, when as we are exhorted by the wise Man to use diligence, to seek for wisdom as for hidden treasures, early and late, that another Order shall enjoin us to know nothing but by statute.

I would that such a trembling one might become imbued with the spirit of Jefferson and with his faith in the Republic as revealed in his inaugural address, March 4, 1801, when he said:

> If there be any among us who wish to dissolve this Union or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated, where reason is left free to combat it.

He was, of course, referring only to errors of opinion, and not to disloyalty and criminality of action, which, of course, can and should be punished under statutes which did before exist and which will remain in force after the espionage act has been repealed.

For myself, I shall contend here for an absolute freedom of speech and of the press, for full publicity in connection with the business of the Government, for a diplomacy absolutely open at every stage to the public view, for an immediate release from the clutch of a reactionary administration of the cables, the telegraph and telephone systems, the myriad swinging wires of which, like the tenuous web of association fibers within the brain of man, make possible that communication, association, and comparison of thought and ideas which compose the common public mind, the all but infallible conclusions of which, when its processes are undisturbed, are wise beyond the wisdom of any man and are the nearest approach in this sphere of many limitations to the absolute reason and wisdom of the Diety.

Referring to this question of free speech and of a free press, to the question of secret diplomacy, to which this administration seems, contrary to its many professions, to be committed, to the questions of the consideration of treaties behind closed doors, and of that rather suspicious secretiveness on the part of those who are dealing, it seems to me destructively rather than constructively, with the complex problem of our relations with Russia, I would call your attention to the words spoken by Lord Northcliffe at Paris recently:

> Nothing can be worse for the prospects of the coming conference than an atmosphere of secrecy and half truths.

And we have been hearing some half truths to-day, Mr. President, from the State Department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the statement he has just made is entirely fair? The Senator will take into account the fact that we have been, and still are, at war with the greatest military government of all times. The Senator knows that one of the first obligations resting upon a country at war is, so far as it may be done, to prevent the enemy from obtaining information as to the plans of his opponents. Does the Senator think——

Mr. FRANCE. Ah, Mr. President, I have heard that argument before.

Mr. KING. May I complete my sentence? If the Senator objects, I shall be glad to take my seat.

Mr. FRANCE. I do not object, of course.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that there was anything improper in Gen. Foch and the military staff failing to disclose to Germany or to the Bolsheviks their plan in sending troops to Russia? Does not the Senator think, in other words, that it was a proper and prudent thing to do not to disclose their military plans in sending troops not only to Siberia but to the White Sea?

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, the able Senator from Utah opens up a large subject, and it is difficult to know where to attack it, but I will attack it right here.

I listened with profound interest to the remarks—I believe the authoritative remarks—of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] this afternoon. I did not care to interrupt him, but if I had done so I would have asked him this question, which I now ask the Senator from Utah, who is an able lawyer: Was not Russia legally, when we invaded her territory, a neutral country? And if we invaded that neutral country in order to fight the Germans, as the Senator from Nebraska very clearly said to-day, what grievance can we justly urge against Germany because she had invaded helpless Belgium to fight the French and English? I think both of these invasions were inexcusable, and I also believe that there was no authority existing to send American troops to invade Russia until that authority was given by the Congress of the United States, into whose hands the fathers very wisely committed the decision of the momentous questions as to whether we should enter upon war; and it was largely because that very function of declaring war had not been securely lodged in the representative chambers of Germany that we called Germany an autocracy. Now, either the Senator must contend that Russia was not neutral territory, that we did not invade her to fight Germany, that it is no war to march troops for belligerent purposes onto a foreign soil, or he must see the impropriety of the whole procedure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator intended me to reply to the interrogation which culminated in a speech which was just submitted. If so, I shall be very happy to submit in a few words at least an attempt to reply to the question.

Mr. FRANCE. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so, although I know that the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has some very important observations to submit upon a most important subject, and I had assured him that I would not take over 15 minutes. In fact, I thought the remarks which I had intended to make would scarcely consume more than 10 minutes. If the Senator from New York does not object, I think it would be only fair to allow the Senator from Utah to answer some of those questions, and I hope he does so upon the authority of the administration.

Mr. KING. I do not want to intrude upon the Senator from Maryland, nor upon my good friend the Senator from New York. I shall be very happy, however, to reply to the questions of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator from Utah will explain this to me most unexplainable and inexcusable action at some future time, because I think it will require even his great ability as a lawyer—for which I have the highest admiration—to defend such an act and the men responsible for it. I do not hesitate to say, right here, that I hope the Senator has had some experience in criminal law, if he undertakes to defend that action.

Mr. KING. I would only need a knowledge of equity to defend that.

Mr. FRANCE. I will resume my quotation from Lord Northcliffe; and this is a question also which I should like the Senator from Utah to answer when he speaks in defense of this administration—the administrations, rather, because there are several of them in Europe which seem to be committed to a secret negotiation of these treaties of peace:

> Shall the destinies of millions of people in all quarters of the globe be left to the tender mercies of a comparative handful of delegates, against whose enactments there is no public appeal? Such would be mockery of that principle of self-determination of free nations which has been fought for and won in this war.

And, again, in this connection, I would call your attention to the words of grand old Samuel Adams, who in his great defense of American independence, delivered on August 1, 1776, said:

> Truth loves an appeal to the common sense of mankind. Your unperverted understandings can best determine on subjects of a practical nature. The positions and plans which are said to be above the comprehension of the multitude may always be suspected to be visionary and fruitless. He who made all men hath made the truths necessary to human happiness obvious to all.

And I want to say that I know Maryland farmers, not acquainted with political life, who are more competent to pass upon some of these mysterious problems now being considered by the Department of State than some of the men who are in that department drawing large salaries, which these same farmers help to pay.

So spoke Adams and the other fathers. May we never lose their faith, either in times of peace or in periods of stress and war, in these principles which they enunciated, the great fundamental principles upon which are laid the everlasting foundations of this Republic.

I desire to give notice that I shall press, with whatever resources are at my command, the enactment of this repealing legislation. I trust that the Judiciary Committee may find an opportunity to report this bill favorably at a very early date, but I feel it to be my duty, whatever the action of the committee may be, to secure an early vote, in order that the attitude of the Senate upon this question may be determined.

In speaking as I have I have spoken for myself alone, and not for the Members upon this side of the Chamber. I have no doubt, however, that when this question shall come to a vote, a very large number of those upon this side of the Chamber will vote for the repeal of this espionage act. For if they did not do so, it seems to me that they would be violating the best traditions of our party, the party which has always been the great progressive, constructive, liberal party of the Republic.

Our party does not believe in democracy disorganized and disorderly. We have faith in the Republic so constituted that, if its public officers observe and obey that constitution, liberty is insured to each citizen, and all are secured against every form of tyranny, even the tyranny of majorities over minorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill introduced by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SHIP CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the urgent deficiencies act of June 15, 1917, authorizes the President during the period of the war to requisition any existing or future contracts for the building, construction, or purchase of ships or material, and further authorizes him to confer upon the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation powers to carry out his orders in connection with the purchase, construction, and operation of all merchant vessels.

This act also provides that all authority granted to the President herein or by him delegated shall cease six months after the final treaty of peace is proclaimed between this Government and the German Empire. Under the terms of this and subsequent bills the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation have been authorized to expend nearly $4,000,000,000. By the powers given them they have requisitioned ships under construction and have made contracts for the construction of steel, wooden, and concrete vessels of every sort. The fact that six months after peace is declared much of the power of the Emergency Fleet Corporation will cease has prompted me to address myself to the subject and to offer to the Senate some suggestions regarding this problem.

In considering the work of the Emergency Fleet Corporation up to the time of the signing of the armistice on November 11 last, it is necessary to take into consideration certain facts at the time work was started.

First. There were under construction or contracted for by private owners in American shipyards, some of these being British and Norwegian, over 400 steel ships of approximately 2,900,000 dead-weight tons. A very large proportion of these contracts were in yards on the Pacific coast. These ships were requisitioned by the Fleet Corporation and the deliveries made have been included in the total tonnage reports. They constitute two-thirds of the total delivered since the Fleet Corporation began operation. These ships would have been constructed without reference to the activities of the Fleet Corporation, but it is possible that their delivery has been hastened to some extent by the payment of bonuses for overtime and allowances for increases in wages paid.

Second. In addition to the well-developed shipyards on the Pacific coast, there were in operation a dozen or more yards on the Great Lakes. All of these yards were well organized and had regular forces of skilled ship workers. It was necessary only to expand and enlarge these yards for the increased output made necessary by the war. Approximately 96 per cent of the steel ships actually built and delivered under contracts made by the Fleet Corporation up to November 11 last have come from the Pacific coast and Great Lakes yards.

Third. Practically all of the established shipyards on the Atlantic seaboard were filled to capacity with Navy Department work or with a part of the private work contracted before the war.

Fourth. In order to put into construction the immense tonnage of new ships demanded by the war situation it was necessary to contract for the building of many new yards and to make contracts for ships with new and entirely inexperienced organizations, whose yards were still to be constructed.

Fifth. Facilities had in many cases to be provided or enlarged for the manufacture of machinery and special equipment required for the ships.

Sixth. Shipbuilding has not been one of the really great American industries. This meant that the supply of men for all branches of the work—mechanical, designing, and administrative—was very limited and that a large share of the contracts must be made with untrained organizations. Even this supply was cut down to a certain extent by the operation of the draft law.

With these facts in mind, an examination of the accompanying tabulations will give a clear understanding of the good and bad points of the work performed.

Several things are evident:

(1) The established yards, working on both requisitioned and contract steel ships, rendered excellent service and have practically fulfilled their delivery promises.

(2) The new yards which have been constructed for the building of steel ships have not been able to produce ships either rapidly or economically. In fact, their contribution in finished ships has been practically nothing and their costs of production exceedingly high. There have been a few exceptions to this where the builders were men of wide shipbuilding experience and utilized part of their trained organization to operate new yards.

(3) Entirely too much dependence was placed in wooden ships. The only possible justification for an extensive wood-ship program in these times was the belief in certain quarters that the ships, hundreds of them, could be built and put into operation in a few months after the signing of contracts. Contracts were made without proper investigation as to the responsibility of the contractors, their knowledge of the work, or the probable source of their supply of materials.

It was evident to any well-informed observer at the end of a few months that the wood-ship program must be a great disappointment. Nevertheless, contracts for more wood ships continued to be let. In the month of October, 1918, contracts were placed for 47 wood cargo ships of 197,500 dead-weight tonnage; a total of 731 wood cargo ships were contracted for, and so unsatisfactory were they that immediately upon the signing of the armistice contracts for 160 were canceled.

Experienced shipping men of the country from the very beginning insisted that the wooden-ship program could not hope to be of real value, and already the Shipping Board has offered these vessels for sale. They were never fit for overseas traffic. In fact, very early in the war, Mr. Homer Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. and reputed to be the best-informed shipbuilder in the country, stated before the Commerce Committee of the Senate that they could never be utilized permanently for overseas traffic.

Of the 92 that were accepted by the Government up to the time of the signing of the armistice, 2—the Blackford and the Coos Bay—have already sunk, and 10 others were compelled to lay up for repairs after a voyage of less than 1,000 miles. These wooden ships, unless disposed of by our Government, may be utilized for coastwise trade, but have little value outside of that. If the Government could sell them at 50 per cent of their cost, it would be an excellent bargain.

The contracts entered into by the Fleet Corporation were of several kinds, including lump-sum contracts for ships, cost-plus-fee contracts for ships, cost-plus-fee contracts for both yards and ships, and those which provided allowances of various kinds for plant extensions or other items of expense.

In practically all instances the contractors are protected against advances in wages and cost of material, both items being to a large extent controlled by the various governmental war boards.

This means that the actual cost of the ships under contract can not be determined in advance and will in nearly every case very largely exceed the estimates.

The very high prices paid for materials, the large wage increases allowed, the exceedingly small output of work per man, the cost of the many and varied social and industrial service activities fostered by the Fleet Corporation, and the necessity for charging off a very large part of the plant investment in these contracts have resulted in a total cost for these ships approximately three times that of similar ships in a normal prewar period and nearly five times the cost in British yards. In addition to these costs, there must be charged the expense of the Fleet Corporation's own activities and much of the money expended for housing and transportation facilities.

Contracts for approximately 35 per cent of the total tonnage of new steel ships were let on some form of cost-plus contract to five shipbuilding concerns, only one of which had previous experience in the work. These were as follows:

	Ships.	Dead-weight tons.
American International, Hog Island, Pa	180	1,385,000
Merchant Shipbuilding Corporation, Bristol, Pa	60	540,000
Submarine Boat Corporation, Newark, N. J	150	785,400
Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, five yards	111	783,400
Carolina Shipbuilding Corporation, Wilmington, N. C	12	115,200
Total	513	3,609,000

The total estimated cost of these ships, including cost of yard construction where that was a part of the contract, was approximately $745,000,000.

The probable cost of these ships will be nearer $1,000,000,000. This makes an average cost per dead-weight ton of approximately $275, without the cost of supervision and control by the Fleet Corporation.

Of these 513 ships, only 4 had been delivered up to November 11, 1918, out of 103 promised by that date.

An analysis of the results obtained under the contracts with the American International Shipbuilding Corporation, the Merchant Shipbuilding Corporation, and the Submarine Boat Corporation is given in tables and notes attached hereto.

The Carolina Shipbuilding Corporation laid its first keel on November 2, and its work has not reached a point where analysis is possible.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether the International Shipbuilding Co. is the one which was operating at Hog Island?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the cost which the Senator gave of $275 per ton, dead-weight, include the fifty or sixty million dollars which the Hog Island plant cost, or is it exclusive of that?

Mr. CALDER. In my statement I averaged the cost of all the ships being constructed in the agency yards, and I include the cost of the yards. The ships being built at Hog Island will cost more than those being built at the other agency yards. Some of the ships being built there will cost over $300 a ton. I will get to that in a moment, if the Senator will permit me. I have some figures dealing in detail with the costs at the Hog Island yard.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator give any information, in the course of his remarks, with reference to the comparative cost between ships built at Hog Island and other shipyards on the Atlantic coast and ships constructed on the Pacific coast?

Mr. CALDER. I have not in my remarks any such information, but I will say that the average price per dead-weight ton of steel ships throughout the country runs about $180 a ton.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean exclusive of the cost of supervision of the yards by the Government?

Mr. CALDER. About $185 is the cost on the Pacific coast.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to direct attention to the fact that it is quite impossible now to tell what the cost of the ships will be when there have been only two or three ships out of a total number of 120, for instance, contracted for. I think the Senator must be aware of the fact that we have not proceeded far enough yet to ascertain fully the cost per dead-weight ton of the ships that are under construction. It may be that a person can make a sort of an estimate about what one ship would cost, but as to the cost of a number of ships or the cost of all the ships under construction it is quite impossible to say what it will be.

I think the Senator can not produce sufficient data to show what the cost has been in the different yards, because all the evidence before the committee, I believe the Senator will agree, is based upon the estimated cost. The contract price is based upon the estimated cost, but the cost of completing a ship can not be said to be greater at Hog Island than at any of the other yards, because we have not up to this time the data upon which to base that calculation. For instance, they have only delivered three ships at Hog Island. There are 58 under construction, all told; that is to say, 8 or 10 have been launched and new ones are taking the place of those on the ways, and the other ways are occupied by ships in various stages of construction, some of which are nearly 75 per cent completed.

How can it be said we are in a position to tell the cost of constructing these ships? It seems to me it is quite a guess. The estimate at Hog Island was about the same as the estimate on the Pacific coast. I doubt very much, when the facts are all given, if it can be established that the cost of the construction of ships on the Pacific coast is less than it is at Hog Island or on the Atlantic coast. By taking one ship and estimating the total amount of the investment and the fact that only one ship has been turned out you will have one figure, but if you distribute the cost of the yard over the whole number of ships under construction, you will get an entirely different figure and, it seems to me, the only fair figure.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I know that it is impossible at this time to say definitely just what these ships will cost, particularly in the agency yards, but we have had an experience in these yards, where we estimated that the construction of the yards would cost a certain amount, and then we find that in nearly every case the cost of equipping the yards has been 100 per cent more than was estimated. Then, too, Mr. President, I have collected here some tables that I know the distinguished Senator from Florida will examine, and that I have no doubt the Fleet Corporation will examine, and I will venture to place my estimate of the cost of these ships in their completed program against what they may say is the maximum. I have gone out of my way to obtain estimates from men in the shipping line who have given me their best judgment, and I base my estimate upon my own knowledge of the situation upon the Fleet Corporation reports and other information I have been able to obtain. I feel reasonably certain, when we have the full report after these ships are completed, they will be found to have cost fully as much as I am estimating their cost to be.

A short résumé of the cost-plus contracts with the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation follows:

Number.	Kind.	Dead-weight tons.	Estimated cost.	Estimated cost per dead-weight ton.	Probable cost per dead-weight ton.
40	Tankers	382,000	$86,993,000	$228	$270
29	Cargo	251,400	49,582,800	197	240
12	Transports	150,000	53,713,200	358	430

111			200,302,000

[1] Each tug.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I inquire of the Senator if those are the companies owned and controlled by Mr. Schwab?

Mr. CALDER. I am under the impression that Mr. Schwab is interested in the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, although I do not know positively.

There remain the three great "fabricated" yards at Hog Island, Pa.; Bristol, Pa.; and Newark, N. J.

The work in these yards was arranged for under what are known as agency contracts. The Fleet Corporation furnishes all the funds required for the construction of the yards and the building of the ships, placing these funds at the disposal of the contractors, who act as agents of the Fleet Corporation in its expenditure. All expenditures incident to the operation, including salaries of executives and all overhead, are considered a part of the cost and are paid directly from the funds provided by the Fleet Corporation.

The contractors receive a fee of approximately 5 per cent on the estimated cost of the ships, with no fee on the cost of yard construction. This fee may be raised or lowered to the extent of about 25 per cent through the operation of bonus and penalty clauses in the contracts. In the case of the Submarine Boat Corporation, the effect of the change from the agency contract to a lump-sum contract is to give the contractor a price in which is included an estimated profit equal to the maximum profit which could have been earned under the original contract. So that this company, if it makes good on its revised estimates of cost, profits largely by the increased cost of the ships while the American International and Merchants suffer a very considerable loss of profit through the same causes.

The cost of the ships built in these yards, including the cost of yard construction, will be approximately as follows:

	Per dead-weight tons.
Hog Island, transports	$340
Hog Island, cargo ships	267
Bristol, cargo ships	240
Newark, cargo ships	206

The attached tabulations show in detail the results obtained in these three yards and the present rate of progress in construction work.

The salient points brought out by the tables are the following:

Complete failure to deliver ships in time to be of actual use in the war program. Ninety-three were promised, none were delivered.

Failure to the extent of 87 per cent in the number of ships launched. One hundred and sixty-four were promised, 22 were launched.

Failure to the extent of 57 per cent in the number of ships placed in construction. Two hundred and forty-nine were promised, 107 were laid down.

Failure to the extent of 66 per cent in the amount of steel erected and of 74 per cent in the number of rivets driven.

The supply of steel from the mills was nearly up to scheduled requirements and much in excess of the quantity actually used in construction.

The supply of fabricated steel was 35 per cent short of estimated requirements, but exceeded actual erection requirements by many thousands of tons.

The construction progress being made in the month from October 15 to November 15 shows the following:

The number of ships launched and in process of outfitting is 69 per cent below normal for scheduled speed. This fact will seriously limit deliveries of finished ships for some months.

There are a full number of ships under construction on the ways, so that the limiting factor in launching from now on will be labor and its turnout.

The actual construction work, I am informed, is progressing at approximately 40 per cent of scheduled speed.

This means that the yards are a very long way behind in work done to date and that they are losing ground rapidly in comparison with scheduled requirements.

The final completion of the work under contract will probably take nearly a year longer than the time allowed in the contracts.

The effect of spreading the work over this longer period will be to very largely increase the overhead costs through the payment of salaries and incidental expenses for the added time.

There are certain facts which have been made plain to the trained observer as the work has progressed and which must be taken into consideration in judging the results obtained.

(1) The Shipping Board has at no time been made up of men with a knowledge of shipping or shipbuilding problems.

(2) There have been many changes in the personnel of the Shipping Board and consequently in its policies.

(3) A very large part of the time and the energies of the Fleet Corporation has been given over to the building up of a great and cumbersome system of supervision, reports, statistics on every conceivable subject connected with the work. In other words, the emphasis has been put upon the building of an organization and compilation of information which might be useful in a long-extended shipbuilding enterprise rather than upon the building of ships as an emergency measure. Most of this information is practically valueless, as it is taken from an emergency operation being carried on under abnormal circumstances and is not applicable to ordinary conditions.

(4) Another very large part of the efforts of the Fleet Corporation has been devoted to a wide range of social and industrial work—investigations, statistics, welfare work, technical and trade instruction, speech making, and so forth.

(5) In the policy adopted toward labor there has been practically no effort made to enforce ordinary discipline or to indicate to the workingmen generally that they were expected to render a fair return of work for the high wages paid. The records indicate that in many instances men being paid by the piece with the possibility of making from $20 to $30 a day did three times the quantity of similar work performed by men on a per diem basis. This condition is due in large measure to the apparent disregard for expense, the grossly excessive office and supervisory forces employed, and the knowledge among the workingmen of the very high salaries being paid. It is an interesting fact that the Hog Island shipyard's overhead expenses are averaging to-day the sum of $1,700,000 a month, and since the start of the work in this yard the overhead charges up to December 1 have exceeded $16,800,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator pardon me for an inquiry?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Unless I misunderstood the Senator, the overhead charges are paid out of the Public Treasury and not by the private corporation that is conducting the operations.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator is correct. They go as a contribution to the cost of building the ships. The money is taken out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is Admiral Bowles still in charge at Hog Island?

Mr. CALDER. I believe he is.

Mr. KING. He is the officer who sent an offensive and highly improper telegram to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], denouncing a Senator who had called attention to the extravagance and waste at the Hog Island yard.

Mr. CALDER. I do not recall the telegram.

Mr. KING. There was such a telegram. A sheet is published under the authority of those directing operations at Hog Island at a considerable expense to the Government. I saw on the front page of that sheet the telegram to which I referred. It appeared in bold type, and its place in the publication, together with the editorial comment, as I recall, clearly manifested a purpose to attack Senators for daring to criticize Government functionaries and agencies.

I have been waiting to see whether the Secretary of the Navy would call Admiral Bowles to account. If he does not do it, I think that a resolution would be proper asking why action was not taken looking to an explanation of conduct so deserving of censure. No official occupying the position held by Admiral Bowles, or one similar, is warranted in denouncing a member of the legislative branch of the Government as he did. The criticism by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] of conditions at Hog Island was made in the discharge of his duty as a Senator and as a member of the committee charged with the responsibility of investigating the work at Hog Island. If the Senator and the committee found conditions that were improper, or if they believed that there was waste and inexcusable extravagance, it was their duty to challenge attention to the same. It is little less than an outrage that Government funds should be employed to publish libelous screeds, in which officials are denounced as "liars" for their fearless exposure of wrongs and the reckless waste of the taxes of the people.

Mr. CALDER. I would say in response to the Senator from Utah that Admiral Bowles is a retired naval officer, and I doubt whether he is under the control of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. KING. The attitude of this officer, his lack of appreciation of the proprieties, his violent outbreak, his utilization of a sheet, doubtless under his control, to give this intemperate telegram to the country, indicate that he is not the proper man for the place and that he should be retired therefrom.

Mr. CALDER. Before entering upon a discussion of terms of the contracts for building ships and shipyards, may I for a moment bring the attention of the Senate to some matters included in a report of the Shipping Board recently filed indicating that it has spent upward of $75,000,000 for housing during the past year? In my judgment, much of this was unnecessary. Many shipyards throughout the country have taken care of the housing of their employees. I believe that this could have been done in other places if the Shipping Board had insisted.

I was interested in the statement made by the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] the other day, in which he called the attention of the Senate to the extraordinary amount of money spent for housing ship workers in northern and eastern States as against the small amount in South Atlantic and Gulf States. I am not here to defend the acts of the Shipping Board in this regard, but to add just a word or two to what the Senator from Florida has stated. He pointed out the amount of money spent in his own State, comparing it to the amount spent in New York.

I remember the figures. They indicated that the amount spent in Florida about equaled the total housing expenditures in New York, despite the fact that in 1918 the State of New York paid into the Federal Treasury over four times as much money as all of the South Atlantic and Gulf States put together.

The thing that interested me most in his statement was the reference to the expenditure of $1,300,000 at Groton, Conn., for the housing of about 300 men. This would seem to indicate that it cost about $4,000 to house the ship workers at this point, a sum which all will agree is most extraordinary, and in my judgment inexcusable, unless these houses are built in a location where they could be easily disposed of after the war is over without regard to whether or not the shipyard at Groton remains.

It is impossible to criticize these matters justly without first-hand information, and that is only obtainable where one can visit the place of expenditure or have a personal representative visit it for him.

In this connection I might add that this morning a representative of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, who has charge of housing, appeared before the Committee on Commerce and discussed with the committee some of the expenditures for this purpose. I was quite surprised to find that the average cost of the frame houses of three, four, and five rooms built at Jacksonville, Fla., including land, was over $4,000. This gentleman stated that in his judgment the Government will be able to sell these houses after the war is over and business is adjusted again at about 60 per cent of their cost to the Government.

I will venture the statement here and take the chance of being a good prophet that in my judgment the Government will be doing very well indeed if we are able to sell these houses for 40 per cent of their cost. If it were left to me to determine the question to-day, and I could sell them for that price, I would make the bargain immediately.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. During the Senator's absence from the Committee on Commerce this morning another matter came up that I think should be mentioned in this connection. The Government has an agency yard, as the Senator is aware, at Wilmington, N. C.

Mr. CALDER. The Carolina Shipbuilding Corporation.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; the Carolina Shipbuilding Corporation, at which there are four ways. There was a proposition to construct houses there at an expense of $500,000. Mr. Piez informed the committee last week that this proposition would be abandoned. A committee from Wilmington, N. C., are here in Washington, and this morning officials of the Shipping Board came before the committee and stated that although not one dollar of expense has thus far been incurred for the houses, in their opinion we should proceed with the construction of the $500,000 worth of houses, where it is admitted that the Government will lose 50 per cent of the cost. Unless some committee of Congress shall express itself in opposition to that waste, that money will be wasted, because there is very great pressure being brought to bear to secure that expenditure.

Mr. CALDER. I thank the Senator for calling the Wilmington, N. C., operation to the attention of the Senate. In my judgment it is inexcusable. There ought to be sufficient housing facilities there to take care of the ship workers at the ship plant at Wilmington, and there ought to be people enough interested in this great project in that city to provide housing facilities for the people employed in the shipyards. That has been done at many points all over the country, and there is no reason why it should not be done at this place.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I was not able to be present at the committee meeting this morning, and I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] what showing was made as to the necessity for building houses there now? The winter has been on for some little time and this shipbuilding corporation has been in operation for some time. They certainly have been able to take care of the housing necessities thus far. What was the showing made as to the necessity for this work?

Mr. CALDER. I think perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin can answer that question better than I. He was present at the committee meeting this morning.

Mr. LENROOT. I will state that the yard has just been completed. The first keel was laid last month. My information is that there are 900 men employed there and that it will require a much larger number when they proceed with four ships. Speaking individually, there can be no possible reason for the construction of four ships at a time now at such a very greatly added expense. They have sufficient housing facilities if they will construct two ships at a time.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in my judgment, certain modifications of the existing conditions should be made at once.

(1) The general policies of the Shipping Board and the scope of its activity should be determined by Congress.

(2) The board should be composed of men whose business experience qualifies them to work out the details under these policies and within the limits set.

(3) The Emergency Fleet Corporation should be organized on a strictly business basis as the construction branch of the Shipping Board. The executive head of the Fleet Corporation should have sufficient authority to enable him to make decisions promptly and to carry on the work as private business is carried on.

(4) The activities of the Fleet Corporation in connection with the work of privately owned yards having contracts for ships should be limited to the proper inspection of the work and to rendering assistance in the supplying of materials and facilities.

(5) The work in the Government-owned yards should be carried on as a direct Government work, under the immediate control and direction of the Fleet Corporation. The assumption that the corporation now acting as agents of the Fleet Corporation under these contracts were really furnishing the "know how" in return for the fees to be paid them is shown to be founded upon a fallacy. They did not "know how" when they began the work; their records show practically no progress toward "knowing how" at present; they have spent and are spending enormous sums of the Government's money unnecessarily; their organizations are unwieldy and extravagant. The cost of the operations would be very much reduced under Government direction.

It would be quite impossible to convert these into lump-sum contracts under existing conditions without paying a price which would be exorbitant in every way. The best results can only be obtained by direct Government operation. Such operation would also make it possible to close out these emergency operations without the complications which must result from working through an agent. The work has gone too far to be canceled to advantage.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There would be an additional saving if the Government should take over the Hog Island shipyard, for instance, of not less than $8,000,000 in fees and possibly $14,000,000 in fees that go to the agent corporation, which has rendered no service at all to the people of the United States.

Mr. CALDER. I thank the Senator from Mississippi.

I have here the total of the requisitioned ships which were contracted for and were under construction at the time of the organization of the Emergency Fleet Corporation that were taken over by them. The summary of these vessels is as follows:

Requisitioned ships.

Kind of ship.	Total contracted for.		Deliveries required to Oct. 31, 1918.		Actual deliveries to Oct. 31, 1918.		Required deliveries not made.		Per cent of failure.

[1] Surplus.

These vessels, Mr. President, were all contracted for and under construction before we entered the war.

I also submit a table which indicates that the Emergency Fleet Corporation has contracted for the construction of 10,393,000 dead-weight tons of steel vessels, of which only 612,200 tons were delivered up to October 31, 1918.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert this table in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Contract steel ships.

Kind of ship.	Total contracted for.		Deliveries required to Oct. 31, 1918.		Actual deliveries to Oct. 31, 1918.		Required deliveries not made.		Per cent of failure.

[1] Dead-weight tons not given for tugs.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from New York may show it a little later on; but I wonder whether he does show just what time these ten-million-odd tons are to be completed under the contract?

Mr. CALDER. I have not those figures, Mr. President. I have the figures here indicating the total tonnage that should have been delivered on the day of the signing of the armistice; and those figures are 1,492,248 tons, of which only 612,200 tons were delivered. I have not, however, the facts asked for by the Senator from Washington.

It is an interesting fact that of 106 steel ships delivered up to October 31, 43 of these were constructed on the Pacific coast, 60 on the Great Lakes, and 3 on the North Atlantic seaboard. The question undoubtedly will be asked why were more not delivered from the Atlantic coast yards. This can be answered by the statement that these yards were all filled by orders for naval ships and merchant vessels requisitioned by the Shipping Board.

I ask unanimous consent to print in connection with my remarks a table showing the cost and progress of the ships being constructed by the American International Shipbuilding Corporation at Hog Island, Pa. This statement shows that the yard construction exceeds by $34,000,000, or 113 per cent of the original estimates, and that the ship construction will probably exceed the estimates by the sum of $81,000,000, or 32 per cent of the total. These figures indicate a careful analysis of the whole project. Under the schedule agreed upon 15 ships should have been delivered by November 11. None were delivered by that date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to print the table referred to will be granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Statement of cost and progress.

	Estimated cost.	Probable cost.	Excess cost.	Per cent excess.

Mr. CALDER. The first ship launched was scheduled for delivery 51 days after launching. On November 11, 98 days after launching, she was still undelivered.

I ask also unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement of the cost and progress of the Merchants Shipbuilding Corporation, at Bristol, Pa. These figures indicate that the cost of the yard construction exceeded the estimates by the sum of $6,500,000 and that the probable cost of the ship construction will exceed the estimates by over $31,000,000.

Under the schedule agreed upon 25 ships should have been delivered by November 11. Not one was delivered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the table referred to by the Senator from New York will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CALDER. The first ship launched was scheduled for delivery 28 days after launching. On November 11, 89 days after launching, she was still undelivered.

Mr. President, in my judgment it will be found that the change in the contract between the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Submarine Boat Corporation from cost plus with fixed profit modified to a lump-sum price will be profitable to the Government. It is true that the ships being constructed by this concern will cost $27,000,000 more than at first estimated, but most of this increase can be accounted for by the increased cost of labor and material, and while the Submarine Boat Corporation will apparently earn $2,000,000 more than the profit originally fixed in the contract, in the end this will be advantageous to the Government, for here the contract is really an incentive for the builder to finish his work expeditiously and economically.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a table with total figures on the progress and cost of the work of the Submarine Boat Corporation.

Under the schedule agreed upon, 53 ships should have been delivered by November 11, and not one was delivered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the table referred to by the Senator from New York will be printed in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. CALDER. The average time on the ways for the 15 ships launched previous to November 11 was 191 days.

The first ship launched was scheduled for delivery in four months from date of launching. On November 11 she had been in the water nearly six months and was still undelivered. Three others were in the water nearly four months and still undelivered.

In considering time consumed on these ships, it must be considered that they are only about 65 per cent as large as those in the other two yards and are simpler in many ways.

The figures I have quoted indicate that, including the requisitioned contract steel ships and wooden cargo ships, when completed, the United States will have a net tonnage of 16,000,000 tons. This is, of course, exclusive of privately owned American ships, which will total about 4,000,000 dead-weight tons.

If this fleet of vessels are of a character that can compete with the tonnage of England and other maritime nations of the world, then, indeed, the United States has made a real advance toward a permanently successful merchant marine.

Recently in the hearings before the Committee on Commerce Mr. Piez, general manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, stated in reply to a query that the Fleet Corporation was carefully examining into the question as to whether or not the ships being built by them were competent to compete with the ships being constructed in England and Japan and other maritime countries. This is a very important matter, for if this great tonnage, when completed, is not of a character to carry freight as expeditiously as other nations, then, indeed, our ships will have been built in vain.

This question is one that has been occupying the attention of the maritime powers of the world for the past year. They knew that we were building a great fleet of fabricated vessels that could be operated at a speed of 10 knots an hour, and I am told that Great Britain a year ago began the construction of ships that would outsail ours. The Shipping Board denies that this is so and insists that our vessels can compete with the rest of the world. I sincerely hope that this is true.

Newspapers indicate that the Shipping Board have purchased the International Mercantile Marine. I do not know whether or not this is so, but with the war over I can not understand the necessity of this purchase. Many of the ships owned by this company are splendid vessels. Others are old and antiquated, some of them having been in commission for over 30 years. Newspapers suggest that these vessels were purchased by the Shipping Board only because an English company was about to take them over. The war is over, and I can not see any reason why we should pay an exorbitant price for these ships simply because some one else wants them. Surely in the course of a year or two, when business is normal again, we could duplicate this fleet for less money than the Government is paying for it. If we did that we could build modern vessels which could compete in speed and in equipment with any other fleet afloat.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator, just on that point, not committing myself one way or the other, or going into any details regarding that transaction, if he would not think that $90 a ton in cash for those ships would be getting them at very much less than we could build them for, and be a very fine bargain?

Mr. CALDER. In answer to the Senator from Florida, I will say that there are many ships owned by the International Mercantile Marine that would be cheap at $90 a ton—very cheap—and a great many of them would be very dear at that figure.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am speaking now of the whole tonnage, of about 850,000 tons. The fleet includes such ships, as the Senator knows, as the Olympic, the Adriatic, the Celtic, and other ships which originally cost over $200 a ton. Taking the whole tonnage of 850,000 tons at $90 a ton, would not the Senator think that was a bargain?

Mr. CALDER. That would seem to be a bargain, I will admit, at present prices and under present conditions, but I am convinced that before two years roll by we can in this country duplicate that fleet for very nearly the price we are asked for it by the International Mercantile Marine. For my part, as between purchasing them at that figure and not purchasing them at all under present conditions, with the tremendous tonnage that we now have in sight, I should prefer not to purchase them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator from New York tell me under what flag those ships are now operating?

Mr. CALDER. I understand that most of them are now operating under the flag of Great Britain.

We will have when our present shipbuilding program is completed a large number of cargo ships with speed ranging from 10 to 14 knots, but so far as I have been informed we will have no greater passenger ships, and the money spent by the Shipping Board for the purchase of the International Mercantile Marine might better be utilized for this purpose.

As I indicated in the opening of my remarks, the law provides that the authority granted to the President in relation to the construction and operation of these vessels shall cease six months after the final treaty of peace is proclaimed between this Government and the German Empire. This presents a problem to the Congress which warrants their beginning at once an intimate study of our whole maritime problem.

What disposition shall we make of this fleet of vessels that cost this country nearly $4,000,000,000? Will it be the determination of Congress to permit the Shipping Board to operate these vessels permanently? Shall we lay down a governmental policy by which ultimately we shall drive out of business every privately owned vessel in America, or shall we offer for sale this fleet to men accustomed to the operation of ships at a reasonable price, marking off their cost the additional war-time expenditures, and then, after that is done, can we operate them successfully in competition with our maritime rivals?

Robert Dollar has suggested the sale of this entire fleet at a reasonable figure and its operation under the American flag, paying to the seamen employed on the vessels the difference in pay between that given by foreign shipowners and the amount usually paid to American seamen? We are informed by the newspapers that Mr. Hurley, the president of the Shipping Board, is in Europe seeking to make arrangements with our maritime competitors by which they will increase the compensation of the men who sail on their ships to the same rate we give ours. A moment's consideration of this statement will stamp the suggestion as absurd. Does anyone suppose that Japan, Norway, Italy, or Spain, without considering Great Britain, France, or Germany, will ever agree to any such proposal?

Shall we, as has been suggested, organize a corporation under Federal charter, the stock of which shall be purchased by individuals, and to which the Government shall guarantee a reasonable return, this fleet to be turned over to this corporation at a fair price and then conducted by it as a private enterprise?

To any student of American shipping it must be apparent that no American fleet of merchant vessels can be operated without Government aid either in one form or another. If it is operated as a Government enterprise the loss will be covered up in appropriations by Congress for the maintenance of the fleet. This sort of business everyone knows will be extravagant and inefficient and can not hope to be permanent, and, so far as I am concerned, it is my purpose to oppose permanent control and operation of a Government-owned merchant marine.

The seaman's act, too, must be modified. I have offered amendments to it which I am hopeful after a thorough examination of the subject may meet with the favorable consideration of Congress. I believe these amendments will not injure the men who sail the seas and will be most helpful to the owners. We lacked sufficient seamen to operate the vessels sailing under our own flag before the war began.

We have brought a great many men into the service, but those who have examined this subject know that most of the men recruited into the merchant marine during the war will go back to their former vocations. With a fleet five times as large as we had in 1916, we can not hope to operate it under the present regulations. I would not for a moment take away from these men the additional safeguards and comforts given them by this measure, but a modification would be welcomed by those who have examined into the subject fully. Never since the Civil War has such an opportunity presented itself to this country to have a merchant marine as it does to-day. We are building one at enormous expenditure—three times what it would have cost in peace days—but somehow or other we could not agree upon the terms of building one in less perilous times. It has seemed to those who live on the seaboard that the people back in the country have failed to understand that if we hope to maintain a permanent foreign market for the products of the factory and the farm we must maintain a merchant marine under the American flag to carry our American goods to the places where they could be sold advantageously.

To-day that fleet is in sight. Shall we dissipate it by lack of foresight? Shall we not begin by telling the American people the truth, explain to them that we can not hope to succeed unless they are willing to contribute each year some little part toward the maintenance of this fleet, or shall we pretend that American ingenuity can outstrip England, Japan, and other maritime competitors?

We need to look back to the history of other days to realize the part the American Nation played in trade on the seas; how in the years following the Revolution American vessels carried 92 per cent of our overseas trade, and this was built up through preferential customs duties and tonnage taxes. We saw this business dwindle until in the spring of 1914 only 8 per cent of our foreign trade was carried in ships flying the American flag. Will we permit this condition to exist again? We brag of our greatness and our capacity to supply the world, and yet in the days before we entered the European war south of Panama a Bank of England note was worth more than our gold. We insist that we were the first country to open the door to China—and we did—but China has not seen us since. Nor does she know why the American flag never flies in her ports. We were the first Nation to open the door to Japan, and if we cross the ocean and enter her island empire we must do so under her own flag. The Philippines are ours, but Japan controls the trade of the islands. Hawaii is a Province of this country, but her great trade is with the Orient. Porto Rico is under the dominion of the United States, but much of her trade is still with Spain. South America is nearer to us than she is to Europe, and by every rule of business ought to be our customer; but England and Germany have dominated her commerce for half a century. Our Monroe doctrine has protected Mexico, but she laughs at our protestations of friendliness.

American ingenuity first thought out water transportation by steam, and we are now for the first time in 50 years actually considering the creation of a permanent merchant marine. American shipbuilders conceived the iron ship, and until the surrender of the German fleet we were fourth in the navies of the world, and before the outbreak of the European war our overseas merchant marine was less than that of Norway, although we have forty times her population and three hundred times her wealth.

In our War with Spain the United States was compelled to rake the shipping of the world to get sufficient transports and colliers to carry an army to Cuba and the Philippines and to supply auxiliary craft for the Navy. In 1907, when our fleet sailed around the world, we did not have enough American colliers to furnish coal for our ships of war. In the present war we were compelled to move an army from our shores to France, and if it had not been for the transports furnished by England and France instead of having 2,200,000 men in Europe on November 1 and to have supplied them with the things that an army needs we would not have had one-third of that number there.

The first 1,000,000 tons of steel ships delivered by American shipbuilders to our Shipping Board since the war began would not have been obtained but for the foresight of English and Norwegian companies, who had contracted with American shipbuilders for them, and these ships were requisitioned by our own Government. We must have the best of ships so that we may compete under the best circumstances. I have already referred to the fact that the creation of this great merchant fleet now under construction would cost when completed upward of $4,000,000,000, and of that sum at least $1,500,000,000 is still to be spent. Will the American people stand for this additional outlay? I am hopeful that they will.

Let us modify the law so that these vessels may be sold to private interests and operated by them for the benefit of the American people. I am sure a method can be evolved that will save the country the least possible loss and assure the effective utilization of this great national investment. I am mindful of the fact in considering this whole problem that we must contend with two great competitors.

First, England, with her capacity for the sea, her great shipyards, and her ability to build and operate vessels much cheaper than we can, with her colonies and island possessions all over the face of the earth, enabling her to trade to and from these places profitably, while ships with American cargoes sailing from American ports for other countries will often have difficulty in obtaining return business. England has built up through her banking and other trade facilities business connections in the remotest corners of the world. To compete successfully with her we must establish trade relations and be prepared to extend the same credits as any other nation. We must know the methods of the rest of the world and be prepared to meet them with an American system and American goods better than theirs, or else our merchant marine will be of little value, for without trade to carry our ships are useless.

Second. Our second serious competitor is Japan, that wonderful country, that has already driven our merchant marine from the Pacific Ocean and can at much less cost build and man a merchant marine. We can not hope to regain our former position in the trade with the Orient unless the Government is willing to assist.

These are serious questions which require the careful consideration of the wisest men of the Nation. I have wondered if our present Shipping Board, which is apparently committed to a policy of Government ownership, has had the sort of experience that equips them to handle a problem of this magnitude. I regret that the President has not seen fit to place upon the board men of wide experience in the building and operating of ships.

This is the first genuine opportunity the United States has had for a real merchant marine in the past 60 years, and if we had the courage to go to the American people, explain to them that we have invested nearly $4,000,000,000 of their money in this undertaking, and that to maintain it we must have their support—if we do this in an intelligent way without partisan bias I am sure they will respond.

PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I listened this afternoon to the very interesting debate with reference to the situation in Russia. It is too late to now enter into any further discussion of that matter. I simply wish to say that I agree with the statements made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that we can hardly expect to restore peace in that great domain by sending armies there. I believe we can accomplish more by feeding that hungry nation. We know that in the case of an individual when he is hungry he is dangerous, and it is even more true that a starving nation is dangerous. For that reason, Mr. President, I am going to take the time of the Senate for a few moments to address myself to the question of production and the question of the prices of foodstuffs.

A great many communications with reference to the price of wheat for 1919 are addressed to me, and every day I am receiving letters asking for information relative to the guaranty by the Government for the 1919 crop.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GRONNA. I am sorry, Mr. President, that I can not yield to the Senator. I shall finish my remarks in the course of 10 or 15 minutes.

On the 4th day of December last there was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter written by Judge Glasgow, chief counsel for the Food Administration, which letter was addressed to me. This letter fully explains the act fixing the price of wheat for 1918, and also the power extended to the President of the United States to guarantee the price for 1919. It also shows very clearly that the administration intends to fulfill the promises made by Congress and by the administration to the wheat growers of the country, and will ask that the law shall be enforced.

I regret to say, however, that I have observed statements credited to some of the officers of the Food Administration, and also to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House, giving an estimate of the losses which the Government is about to sustain because of this guaranty. I fear that such statements will have their damaging effects upon the production of wheat for 1919.

It has frequently been stated that agriculture is the real foundation of all our industrial wealth. If that be true, everything possible should be done to encourage this industry.

We are just emerging from a world's war, and we have learned from experience that wheat is an indispensable article of food, especially so in times of war, because of its keeping qualities; but it is also an indispensable article of food in times of peace, as it is the most nutritious, wholesome, and by far the cheapest and best cereal in the production of bread.

Those of you who are representing States where manufacturing is the leading industry and where labor is necessarily largely employed are naturally concerned about the protection of these manufactures, as well as in the welfare of the factory workers; but have you carefully considered the fact that without this article of food—bread—your men would have to stop work and your factories would cease operation?

You have had an opportunity recently to try substitutes for wheat bread, and I know that you do not like them.

Now, I ask you to continue to help not only the American farmer who produces wheat, but the laboring man, the people of the United States as a whole, in securing the most nutritious, wholesome food article, and at a lower price—yes, not even one-half the cost of other articles of food on the world's market to-day.

For fear that you have forgotten our admonitions and advice, I am going to ask you to listen to me for just a moment—long enough to tell you what it is costing the American people for bread.

The present price of wheat will average in the various markets in the United States a little less than $2.25 per bushel. Four and a half bushels of wheat will make one barrel of flour. Most people believe that the average consumption of flour per capita is one barrel for the entire year. The Agricultural Department estimates that 5.3 bushels are consumed by one individual person a year. At $2.25 per bushel, using the estimate of the Agricultural Department that it takes 5.3 bushels to feed a human being for an entire year, the cost would be $11.93 at the mill. This would make a little more than a barrel of flour.

Now, I want to be perfectly fair, and will allow $1.07, or at the rate of $1 per barrel, for marketing and the profit to the retailer, which would make the cost of flour to the consumer $13 per barrel, or a little less than 3.6 cents per day, providing you make your own bread; and let me say right now that on the 7,000,000 farms in the United States every ounce of bread is made by the housewife. The housewife on the farm is not depending on somebody else to manufacture the bread for the farm, and I think I might say with perfect safety that nowhere on the face of the earth will you find as nutritious and as wholesome, good bread as may be found on the farm. If the people of the cities refuse to use economy and manufacture their own bread, that should not be laid at the door of the American farmer. Perhaps your bread is costing you more than it ought to cost you, but if it does, it is your fault and not the farmers' fault.

Anyone who has taken the time to study the production of wheat for the entire world knows that there is to-day no great surplus. If we take all the countries into consideration, there is no surplus. The average world production of wheat from 1909 to 1916, inclusive, was about 3,700,000,000 bushels. The estimated population of the world is approximately 1,650,000,000. It may be said that we have different races, and some of the human race do not eat wheat, but we do know that the white, or Caucasian race, the black race, and the red race, all use wheat for bread. It is perhaps true that the yellow, or Mongolic, race, does not use as much wheat as the other races, but the yellow races constitute about 581,000,000, and they use some wheat. But, at any rate, it leaves more than 1,000,000,000 people whose chief article of food is bread. So that with a production of 3,700,000,000 bushels of wheat and a population of more than 1,000,000,000, which for centuries have used wheat as the chief cereal for bread, it is evident that if wheat is distributed to all these people who desire this article for food, there is a large shortage, and not a surplus. Of course, it may be said, and I take it that to a certain extent it is true, that not all of these people are able to purchase wheat. They use other cereals for bread.

I have a statement issued by the Agricultural Department on January 7, 1919, which shows that the visible supply in the United States on December 1, 1918, was only 175,000,000 bushels, and in Argentina less than 2,000,000 bushels. Of course, by including the harvests of 1918 and 1919, it is estimated that Argentina may have a surplus of 185,000,000 bushels, but that is entirely problematical—it is only a guess—nobody knows what the crop is really going to be. The department estimates that Australia has 170,000,000 bushels, and by including the harvests for 1918 and 1919, it estimates that there may be a surplus of 210,000,000 bushels; but we are not certain about that.

Now, outside of Canada and British India, no other countries can be expected to raise a surplus. The war-stricken countries of Europe, with their soils devastated, their labor disorganized, will not be able to produce enough to feed themselves, and they must depend upon America and upon the countries which I have named for the necessary food products.

Those who complain about the fixed price of wheat should know that the best information obtainable shows that the average cost of producing a bushel of wheat, based upon the labor cost of 1917, is $2.47. The average maximum price at the terminals, which does not mean that price to the farmer, is $2.25. Now, if it cost the farmer $2.47 to produce a bushel of wheat in 1917, what did it cost him in 1918, when wages were much higher? And I dare say they will be higher in 1919 than they were in 1917. Why all this cry about the loss to the Government of the United States in guaranteeing a price at least 22 cents less per bushel than it cost to produce it? Where is the injustice to the American consumer? Do not you know that it costs the American farmer more to produce wheat now than it did before the war? Do not you know that the articles which he must buy and the labor which he must hire are costing more?

I have before me a pamphlet issued by the American Exchange National Bank, of New York City, under date of January 1, 1919. I want to read from this pamphlet a short paragraph:

> Buying on a gold basis, inflation of the currency amply secured by gold and other legal resources does not depreciate paper money as measured in gold; but the money of the country, including gold coinage, may be depreciated when measured in commodities. The value of a bushel of wheat as food never varies, but a bushel of wheat commands more dollars and cents just now than it did before the war. The outstanding circulation of the United States is about $54 a head, or about $20 above the average of prewar days. The average price of commodities is now about 290 per cent, or almost three times the average price before the war.

Now, these are matters to think about. The average price of commodities is now about 290 per cent, or almost three times the average price before the war.

The farmer is necessarily a much heavier purchaser than the common laborer; he must buy his mechanical tools and machinery and all things necessary to carry on his farming operations besides what the laborer who works in the factory necessarily must buy. In other words, besides food and clothing, the farmer must buy all articles necessary to carry on his business, and it often happens that the farmer is compelled to buy more machinery during a single year than the value of his entire crop for that year.

I said a moment ago that we have testimony from the most reliable sources that it cost to produce wheat in 1917 $2.47 a bushel. Dr. Spillman, one of the ablest men in the service of the Department of Agriculture, has made a statement that in accordance with his estimates, based upon reports for a number of years, wheat cost to produce not less than $2.47.

We ought to remember that most people now believe that the war is over. During the war the farmers felt that it was their patriotic duty to plant wheat and other grains, regardless of whether they made or lost money. It is different now. Believing that the war is ended the farmers feel that they are not now under the obligation of planting and producing a crop which will sustain a loss, and it is my judgment that we should not discourage the production of wheat, because the farmer may turn his energies to the production of other commodities. More than that, it may, as has been so often the case, discourage him from engaging in the industry altogether.

We hear so much about the "back to the farm" movement, and we are asked why is it that the farm boys are leaving the farms and going to the cities to engage in other industries and in other work? The answer is plain. It is because the farm boy and the farm girl can make more money in the cities. They can get more wages and work less hours, and it is human nature to want to make as much, and with as little expended energy, as possible.

I am writing this letter in the RECORD in the hopes that it may help to counteract the statements which have been made and circulated through the press that the Government may lose hundreds of millions of dollars because the President and Congress have indicated a willingness to enforce the contract made with the individual producers of wheat in this country. I do not believe that the farmers should be compelled to continue to sell their products at a loss, and I have shown that the average cost of wheat to the farmer is more than the price fixed by the Government.

There will be no loss to the Government, unless some genius should undertake and succeed in perfecting an organization which would control the world's market and use such organization to depress prices.

Let us remember that before we entered this war wheat sold in the American markets for a dollar a bushel more than the price we fixed. But when the legislation which was finally enacted was pending we were told by Mr. Hoover that the reason for fixing the price of wheat was to stabilize prices in order to assure production. He stated and restated the proposition that he was opposed to a maximum price and that he wanted only a minimum price fixed. Everybody knows that the minimum price was made the maximum price. The price of wheat was controlled absolutely by the organization known as the Grain Corporation, and for two years we controlled the price of the farmers' most valuable crop at a price per bushel of at least $1 less than what it would have brought in the market if it had been left to the laws of supply and demand.

Do you mean to tell me that, now that the war is over, you are going to repudiate the contract which in times of war took from the pockets of the farmer one-third of what he would have received for his crop if he had been left alone, and that, now you believe there is going to be a surplus, you are going to begin to further discourage him by refusing to fulfill a contract made by Congress and approved by the President of the United States? But you say the farmers have made money out of their crops during the war. In some localities they have; in others they have not made any money; and the most money has been made by the farmer who has been fortunate enough to have most of his own help. If any one of you have visited the farms in this country during the war, you must have seen that old men and women who had retired, and who really felt that they were unable to perform any hard labor, were found in the fields from early morning until late at night, assisting as best they could in the production of food. You must have seen young boys and girls struggling from sunrise until dark, bending all their energies, doing everything possible to perform a man's work. Labor was not only high in price but was scarce and inefficient.

To those of you who believe that the farmer is making large profits let me say to you that the West stands with open arms to receive you and to encourage you to engage in that industry. We are not asking for any exclusive rights to engage in this industry at all. We say to the people of the world: We are glad to have you within the borders of our State; we are glad to have you with us and to compete with us in this great industry. We will not discourage you, but help you if we can. At least we will be neighborly and friendly.

The unfortunate situation, so far as the farmer is concerned, has always been that his organization has never been completed. It has generally been ruined by some ambitious genius who, through his own selfishness, has succeeded in keeping from the farmer the facts, and in that way misled him, and instead of perfecting the organization so necessary to his success, both in production and in marketing his products, it has generally gone on the rocks and been made a regretable failure.

It must be apparent to every citizen that a man who begins his labors at early dawn and works all day until night, and very often part of the night, that he is not in a position to keep posted on affairs. It is for that reason that the farmer has been unable to perfect his organizations, and it is because he has been imposed upon by unscrupulous men who have posed as his friends but in reality have been his worst enemies. These are the reasons why the farmer has not succeeded. The labor organizations of this country are now demanding that those who go out on the farms to work shall insist on an eight-hour day. You know what that would mean to the consumers. Let us suppose that all the farmers in the United States resolved to work only eight hours a day. What do you suppose wheat would cost you per bushel if they should insist on making a profit in their business?

These are matters which must be solved in the near future. There is as much necessity for reconstruction and readjustment in the great industry of agriculture as there is in the enterprise of any other industry, and all the farmers ask is that the same standard of justice shall be applied to them and their industry that is applied to labor and to those who are engaged in the business of manufacture.

It is remarkable, and I might say regretable, to note how apt we are to forget the importance of agriculture, and when questions of which we may be somewhat ignorant are presented we are not only indifferent but we see ghosts, because we do not understand or realize the importance of the matters.

I have often been met with the suggestion that agriculture is as old as the world, and while that may be true I doubt if the United States and the allies could have been successful in the recent war if the old method of farming had not been improved upon. If our people had not emerged from the old system of using a crooked stick for a plow, I am fearful that we would have been in the same condition that Jacob and the Israelites were some 17 centuries before the birth of Christ, when the people of Israel had to go to Egypt for their corn. We would have been in a great deal worse situation than the Israelites were, because there would have been no place for us to go to to secure food products.

If we want peace restored in the world we must first provide the people with food. A hungry man is a dangerous man, and we can hardly expect that the starving people of the world are in a position or in a frame of mind to help restore the peace of the world so that it will be safe for democracy.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a statement prepared by the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRONNA. I also ask to have printed an article which will be found in the Nation's Business, written by Mr. Howard Heinz. I desire the entire article to be printed in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From The Nation's Business, January, 1919.]

A HEART-TO-HEART ABOUT THE FARMER—"BACK TO THE LAND"—CERTAINLY! BUT WHAT ARE WE DOING FOR THIS "LAND"?

(By Howard Heinz, vice president H. G. Heinz Co.)

America has always had vastly greater natural resources than it has had capital or organization to use. Stimulated by war's necessities and assisted by governmental support, our mining and manufacturing industries have been reequipped and reorganized up to a plane that has more closely approximated these resources; and while this has also been measurably true of our agricultural industry, agriculture, during the war period, has made less advance proportionate to the increased demand upon it. And with half the world facing starvation through the devastation of its soil and the division of its man power into nonproductive channels, the problem of world food production during the reconstruction period becomes one of the first magnitude.

Perhaps the principal reason for the failure of our agricultural progress to keep pace with the growth of the Nation, even in normal times, has been a lack of understanding on the part of our urban population of the farmer's problem and a consequent lack of cooperation and encouragement, but this condition has doubtless been improved by the economic lessons which the war has taught us. The farmer and his usefulness to the community is perhaps held in higher appreciation to-day than at any time before in the entire period of our marvelous industrial development, but there remains much to be accomplished before we can reach anything approaching an ideal condition.

For the most part wholly unorganized in any practical way that looks to cooperative productive effort, and to improvement in marketing and distribution methods, a constant prey to the whims of changing weather conditions and compelled to battle unceasingly against the ravages of innumerable pests, it is safe to say that the financial return to the average American farmer is less than that received by the lowest-paid mechanic in any established trade.

With conditions such as described, how can the farmer compete in the labor market for his necessary help, especially when it is remembered that in place of eight hours and time and a half for overtime the farmer's daily work begins with the rising sun and is more often than otherwise finished by the light of the moon. How can he raise the necessary capital out of his meager returns for drainage, fertilizing, and other means of soil improvement? How can he avail himself of costly mechanical tools in substitution for the needed man power which is equally beyond his reach?

The wholesale desertion of eastern farms in recent years, the change from proprietary to tenant farming that is constantly taking place in all sections, the emigration of the bred-in-the-bone western farmer to Canadian land to secure the easier primitive conditions there prevailing, and the flocking of the young people from farms to cities to engage in commercial pursuits all tell an eloquent story of the lack of appreciation and suitable recognition hitherto given to the tiller of the soil.

OVERWORKED AND UNDERPAID.

Every laborer is worthy of his hire, and as labor that is underpaid and especially that which is both overworked and underpaid will seek new channels of effort, it is to be devoutly hoped that war's lessons concerning the importance to our general welfare, and even to our permanent safety, of a thriving and prosperous farming community may not go unheeded.

That the farmer is in some degree to blame for his present condition may not be denied, but far more blameworthy are those interests which have failed to lead, encourage, and support him or which have exploited him.

Successful agriculture constitutes the very foundation of a nation's prosperity. If we are to continue to have available that food surplus for export that is needed to help maintain our balance of world trade, if we are even to continue to be a self-supporting nation in the matter of food supply, there must be a more effective support given to our farming interests; financial, educational, moral, social.

MORE ADVANTAGES FOR THE FARMER.

There must be leadership where we naturally look for leadership in our other lines of activity; intelligent leadership by our men of affairs that will point the way and provide the means to better practical education in improved farm methods, better and more practical local organization of farm interests that will result in more cooperative buying and that will gain for the farmer the advantage of collective bargaining for the sale of what he produces.

The more economical purchase and more intelligent use of fertilizers; seed selection on a large scale; the proper adaptation of soil; rotation of crops as well to meet prospective market conditions as in the interest of soil improvement; the cooperative purchase and cooperative use of farm tractors and other devices calculated to increase production and lighten labor; increase and improvement in stock breeding; a degree of efficiency in scientific management that while increasing product will decrease costs; and an adequate financial backing should be some of the beneficial outgrowths of proper organization in our farm communities that may be depended upon to put our farm operations on a reasonably remunerative basis and encourage the "back to the land" movement advocated by our theoretical economists and with so negligible a result.

Much is being done for the uplift of the farming industry by our Government departments and educational institutions. Our Federal and State departments of agriculture, with their local agents in practically every country, have developed a marvelous efficiency in recent years and the results of their labors are manifest on every hand. Our agricultural colleges have gone far in the dissemination of practical farm knowledge, but the influence of these institutions is not far enough reaching; the process is too slow to meet the urgent need of the day; the work they do must be augmented and extended by the public-spirited men of every community before it will become really effective in influencing general results in any larger way.

With no possible prospect of restoring normal crop conditions in Europe under two or three years or of reconstituting its animal industry in a decade, there is an assured market for all that we can produce in cereals, roots, dairy products, and live stock, including hogs and oil-bearing vegetables, for of all food shortages the most distressing world need is to-day, and will be for some time to come, of animal and vegetable fats, the lack of which has been most acutely felt with marked effect upon the health of the people in all European countries, including the neutrals, throughout practically the entire war period.

Our manifest duty, then, as business men is not only to encourage food conservation by rational living and the avoidance of waste but to encourage and help the food-producing class by lending to it our leadership, our financial support, and our business ability for organization.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

Mr. FRANCE. I object, Mr. President. I think that is a very important bill, and it should be read in full.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will say to the Senator that I had the bill published in the RECORD day before yesterday.

Mr. FRANCE. I should not be willing to consent to the rushing through of this bill. I think it should be read very carefully. It is a most important piece of legislation. I should be opposed to anything which would be in the nature of an attempt to rush it through.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I know the Senator will acquit me of any intention or desire to rush the bill through.

Mr. FRANCE. I do acquit the Senator of that. I know that he wishes to have a clear understanding of the bill, but I merely wish to have the bill read in full.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill will be read for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. FRANCE. Then I will withdraw my objection, if it is to be read for action on the committee amendments. I did not understand the status.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the formal reading of the bill been dispensed with?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. Does the Senator from Maryland withdraw his objection?

Mr. FRANCE. I do, with the understanding that the bill will be read for action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the formal reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the bill may be read for action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for that purpose.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had intended during the course of the day to say something on the subject of our attitude toward Russia and our troops in the Russian territory, but the hour is too far advanced, so I shall content myself by giving notice that when the Senate reconvenes I may have something to say upon the subject.

ALEXANDER F. M'COLLAM.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask leave to make a favorable report from the Committee on Public Lands on the bill (H. R. 1423) for the relief of Alexander F. McCollam, and I submit a report (No. 640) thereon. I wish to say a word in regard to the bill.

This is a bill which was favorably reported by the House Committee on Public Lands and has passed the House. It is to convey title to 1.16 acres of land in Placer County, Cal. It is in a forest reserve, but was classified as agricultural land. It was homesteaded by a homesteader who died before making the final proof. He left no widow, but his estate was administered on and closed up in the courts of California; and this little tract of land, comprising an area of 1.16 acres of land, was sold for a valuable consideration to a purchaser by order of court, and some improvements have been made upon it; and this bill is to convey title to him. The Agricultural Department recommends it, and the Interior Department has no objection to it. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand from the Senator that the homesteader just settled upon this 1.16 acres of land?

Mr. MYERS. So far as the record discloses, that seems to be the case.

Mr. SMOOT. What purpose did he have in mind in settling upon that little piece of land?

Mr. MYERS. He owned some land adjoining, I am told, and he simply wanted this land. I think he built a house on it. It was thrown open to homestead entry by order of the Department of Agriculture. He was intending to homestead it. Everything was done with the approval of the Department of Agriculture, so everything went nicely.

Mr. SMOOT. And he died before it was concluded?

Mr. MYERS. He died, and it was sold by the court.

Mr. SMOOT. He died before he had lived long enough to secure title?

Mr. MYERS. At least before he had made application to make final proof, and it went through the courts, and it was sold for a valuable consideration. Improvements have been put upon it, and this is just simply to straighten out the title.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not located in a town or near a town?

Mr. MYERS. No; the record does not disclose that at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It might be that there was only a fractional piece of land left, and he located upon that because of its proximity to other land.

Mr. MYERS. I think that is the case. I have read carefully the reports of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior on the bill, and they disclose, I am told, about all that is disclosed.

Mr. SMOOT. What surprised me was that he should have located upon that 1.16 acres if he had the right to locate upon 160 acres. It rather made me suspicious that there was some real reason why he should only take this little piece of land.

Mr. MYERS. None was disclosed by the record. None appears at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to say that the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior both approve it.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; they do. They have looked into it thoroughly, and ask its passage.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside so that this bill may be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1423) for the relief of Alexander F. McCollam, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent to Alexander F. McCollam, of Yankee Jims, Placer County, Cal., for the lands described in homestead entry No. 07349, Sacramento series, being homestead-entry survey No. 147, in section 28, township 14 north, range 10 east, Mount Diablo meridian, in Sacramento land district, in Placer County, Cal., and containing 1.16 acres, according to official plat of homestead-entry survey No. 147, in the Tahoe National Forest, made July 19, 1915.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IRA G. KILPATRICK AND GUY D. DILL.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to make another report. This is on a bill in which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] is interested. That Senator called it to my attention, and in his absence I am giving it attention for him. It is the bill (H. R. 8444) for the relief of Ira G. Kilpatrick and Guy D. Dill. I submit a report (No. 641) to accompany the bill. Its passage was recommended by the House Committee on the Public Lands and by the Interior Department. It has passed the House. This is to issue patent to 88 acres of land in Indiana upon the payment to the Government of $1.25 per acre for it. I have read the report made in the House and the report of the Secretary of the Interior, and they set forth in brief these facts:

The land has been occupied by the owners of it and their predecessors in interest for 50 years. It is located in a thickly settled portion of Indiana, and the title has passed a number of times, and there is simply no record of any patent to it. It is one of those cases where, if a patent was ever issued, it was lost or not put on record; and the land has been for 50 years in private ownership. This is simply a piece of legislation to validate the title, and its passage is recommended by the Interior Department.

The bill has passed the House, and I send it to the desk and ask leave to make the report. I also ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8444) for the relief of Ira G. Kilpatrick and Guy D. Dill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title of Ira G. Kilpatrick and Guy D. Dill, as tenants in common, in and to the west half of the southeast quarter of section 3, township 32 north, range 8 east, in the district of lands subject to sale at Fort Wayne, Ind., in Whitley County, Ind., as assignees from Jonathan Pearson, by conveyance be, and the same is hereby, quieted and confirmed, and patent therefor shall issue to the said Ira G. Kilpatrick and Guy D. Dill as tenants in common, upon payment to the United States of $1.25 per acre.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be laid again before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 13, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 9, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Be graciously near, O God our heavenly Father, to our brave and gallant soldiers overseas. Their task having been accomplished, their hearts long for their beloved country and their dear ones at home, who are anxiously waiting their coming. Give them patience, endurance, fortitude, in the long hours they must wait; and bring them all back in safety. Especially be near to the wounded and sick, to comfort and sustain them; and Thine be the praise, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE RAILROADS.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a series of four letters which passed between Judge McChord, Interstate Commerce Commissioner, and Mr. Sisson, vice president of the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, on the question of railroad rates, management, and so forth, which I think, in view of the fact that we are soon to have railroad legislation, should be printed in the RECORD for the information of Members of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to incorporate certain letters in the RECORD on the subject of railroad rates. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 4240. An act for the relief of Alma Harris.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois] on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks indefinite leave of absence for his colleague [Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois] on account of illness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RELIEF FOR INFORMAL CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the unfinished business is the contract bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, if necessary, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary. Under the rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] has 30 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] 1 hour and 30 minutes. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I had expected to support this measure, because I believe the Government of the United States, like every one of its honest citizens, should live up to all its obligations and not repudiate them because of mere informality under any circumstances; but I was somewhat shaken in my purpose when I found the bill to be in the form in which it has been reported, with an entire absence of information which Members of the House, in my opinion, were entitled to receive.

This bill is to validate 6,600 and more contracts, involving one and three-quarter billion dollars, and to place that power in the hands of one individual, who, by the request for this measure, has made evident the fact that of the contracts drawn 12 per cent can not pass the auditor, the proper accounting officer.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs said that the Secretary of War should be allowed to pass upon this matter, as he has already passed upon the remaining portion of $15,000,000,000 of expenditure. I wonder what would take place in any well-regulated business in this country if the man in charge of that business should make the abject confession that 12 per cent of his contracts were not according to instructions or law?

But I object to this bill in its present form and shall insist upon its amendment before it shall receive my feeble support, so that the Treasury may be reasonably safeguarded.

The War Department seems to regard informality as an unpardonable sin where the amount involved is small, but almost a virtue where the amount involved is large. From the statements that have been made it is evident that it has been much easier for a man to come to Washington and obtain a million-dollar contract—so far as formality is concerned—than it has been for a soldier who has served his country in the trenches to obtain the small monthly amount which is due him. And I want to remark also—this is the main purpose for which I took the floor—that it has been easier for a more or less insolvent nation of Europe to borrow $100,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States than it has been for a soldier, sick or wounded even unto death, to obtain the money that was justly due him for patriotic services rendered. I speak by the card as to a number of cases. So I believe that we should be careful in giving to one man the power of settling according to his sweet will this billion and three-quarters of contracts without our having any evidence whatever of what number of these 6,600 contracts, or what portion of the gross amount, were contracted 15 minutes before the armistice was agreed upon.

This bill in its present form gives all of the 11th of November to have entered into these informal contracts. It seems to me that anything like a good-faith inquiry, before the head of the department should have been listened to by the committee with anything like favor, would have demanded of that department a classification of these informal contracts to show what ones were entered into on the 11th day of November. My recollection is that we received the news of the armistice being signed before the opening hours of business on the 11th of November. The more nearly the dates of these contracts approach the 11th of November the more I would look upon them with suspicion, or the more, I should say, they would demand careful investigation. Yet the House has been denied any statement or classification of these contracts, what they were or what their general nature was.

Think for a moment what you propose to do—to place in the hands of one man the power to validate these contracts for nearly one and three-quarter billions of dollars. What does that mean? It means the settlement of claims which amount to more than the total wealth of each of a number of the States of this Union. It means the placing in the disposition of the department practically judicial powers to settle this vast sum, an amount so large that it would take a train of cars more than a mile long, carrying 50,000 avoirdupois pounds of gold each, to pay it. It means the settling of claims amounting to a sum equal to one-half of all the assets of the Treasury of the United States which the Treasurer of the United States sees fit to state to the public. The total assets of the Treasury of the United States, outside of one asset, which I intend to refer to in a moment, are about $3,500,000,000, fluctuating from day to day. This sum which they ask us to allow them to settle without a proper hearing, without a report that presents the salient and important facts, equals half of all the assets of the Treasury outside the loans to foreign nations, that institution which we pay thousands of men every year to carefully guard.

But, as I said, informality is an unpardonable sin only in small contracts. We strain at gnats, and sometimes, as they said in olden times, swallow camels. But when I recall the fact that in this same department, if a soldier boy happened to be taken from his own company because of a disease breaking out to which he was absolutely immune, put into a detention camp, he would be sent overseas to serve months in the United States service and not given a dollar of pay due him.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. QUIN. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman about that part; but as far as these contracts are concerned, does not the gentleman think the Government ought to be square and honest with the contractors?

Mr. SLOAN. Absolutely. The gentleman is quoting practically the language I used in opening my speech. We want to be square, and we want to see to it that we put it in the hands of a tribunal that will be square with the contractors and square with the people of the United States.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. Take the case of a corporation that now has on hand $5,000,000 worth of war material that has become practically unsalable—material made to carry on our Government in its effort to win the war—does the gentleman think that it would be good for the business interests of the country for a claim of that kind to await the adjudication of any tribunal that might take years?

Mr. SLOAN. That would be better than to place it in the hands of a tribunal that would not do justice, that had failed in small things. Those who are faithful in small things may be presumed to be faithful in large things; but those who are unfaithful in small things are apt to be unfaithful in large things.

Mr. SANFORD. I think the gentleman's Bible quotation is correct, but that kind of justice is pretty costly for the business interests of this country.

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman repudiates the Bible, I can not agree with him.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question in the mind of any Member as to the advisability of adjusting and paying the so-called illegal claims against the Government as quickly as possible. Gentlemen, it is absolutely necessary for many reasons. Most of these contractors have obligated themselves to banks and the banks have turned their obligations over to reserve banks, and these obligations can not be continued indefinitely.

Another reason is the necessity of getting as many of these items cleared up as possible before we go to the country with the next liberty-loan issue.

If it is admitted that these bills ought to be paid, then it comes down to the point of who should have charge of these settlements.

It has been charged—with a great deal of justification, in my judgment—that the War Department has been inefficient and has not shown good business judgment, and that they have not used promptly the machinery that they had to make legal contracts after the order for goods or property had been given. It is easy to see, from a business standpoint, how many errors have been made. The officers, under the lash of criticism that they were moving too slowly and that red tape should be cut, were working at high speed. Also we must consider the fact that nearly 100 per cent of the contractors were patriotic and anxious to do what they could to help win the war; and inasmuch as it is common practice in business to take the word of both parties to a contract for their authority to at least start the work, it seems that there is some excuse at least for many of the difficulties that surround this question.

For my part, I fear that difficulties will arise in the adjustment of these matters if they are left in the hands of the War Department, and I am sure that many difficulties will arise if it is left to a commission to determine. It is certain that the War Department at this time must have more information with regard to these matters than anyone else could have, and it seems to me it must be admitted that very much of the business of the War Department has been satisfactory to the public. Further, as it has been shown that this $1,600,000,000 is only about 20 per cent of the amount that the War Department has already contracted for, for which settlements have been made, it would seem that they might be trusted to finish up the job. [Applause.]

Therefore, unless some substitute is offered that, in my judgment, would make it possible to close up these accounts quicker and get the money into the hands of the contractors and from them into the hands of the public, I shall favor this bill; and I want to say I am looking at this proposition from the standpoint of a manufacturer, contractor, and banker. I know of my own knowledge of a number of situations that are acute where adjustments must be made quickly or trouble will ensue.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I will.

Mr. GORDON. If the gentleman is looking at it from the standpoint of a manufacturer and a banker, of course his position ought to be for the payment of the claims without any investigation at all.

Mr. SNYDER. I am in favor of paying claims as quickly as possible where the matter has been properly adjusted. I will say further that I shall be satisfied with an adjustment that is made between the manufacturer and some one who is competent in the department to make that adjustment.

Mr. GORDON. But the gentleman wants an honest adjustment?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; and I believe you will get an honest adjustment by this bill as well as you would by sticking in four or five other men.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think we ought to start in our investigation into this question with the national-defense act of the 3d of June, 1916. At that time, before we entered into the war, we passed an act of Congress to prepare this Nation for the conflict that Congress believed was inevitable. That act contained this provision, and I think it is important, because it imposes a penalty on every manufacturer and every citizen engaged in business in this country who does not comply with its provisions. I am not going to read all of it, but it provides, in section 120, among other things, as follows:

> The President, in time of war or when war is imminent, is empowered, through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement, to place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for such product or material as may be required, and which is of the nature and kind usually produced or capable of being produced by such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry. Compliance with all such orders and materials shall be obligatory and shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts—

And so forth. And it winds up with this provision:

> Any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $50,000.

We went into the war without making any preparation for the national defense practically, except in the Navy Department; and the President, under the provisions of this bill, when war was declared on the 6th of April, 1917, began to commandeer the enterprises in this country and the industries of this country to get ready for the war. The Government went into my district—and I want to say right here that I am not interested in any of these contracts. No man has spoken to me about the breach of a Government contract, except in one instance, and I said to him that I would only call it to the attention of the department and would introduce him to the proper accounting officers, but could not represent him. But I know of car works in my district that stopped manufacturing cars, in which they were engaged in a profitable business, and converted one entire part of their plant into the making of shells. I visited the Baldwin Locomotive Co. in company with other Members of the House in September and we found a large part of that manufactory had stopped making cars and locomotives and was manufacturing explosive shells and munitions of war.

On the 11th day of November, while the country was at the highest speed of munition production and most intensely engaged in preparation for war, an armistice was suddenly signed. At that time in the Eddystone plant there were 15,000 employees, 3,500 of whom were women and young girls, working with a zeal and a rapidity that startled every person who went through that plant. At 11 o'clock on the 11th day of November last the armistice was signed, without being anticipated or expected, and immediately the War Department—and I praise them for it—set about canceling these war contracts and stopping the manufacture of these materials. We all understand what a contract is; that it may be in writing, or it may be by parole or oral, or it may be expressed or it may be implied. We are told, and we know, that in this zeal and haste to prepare for war contractors and manufacturers from all over the United States were summoned to Washington and were told, as the testimony of the Secretary in the hearings before the committee states, that as soon as he found they could make the materials, why the War Department ordered them to proceed at once, and to do so without waiting to reduce the contracts under which they worked to the formality required by the practice of the department and the Revised Statutes. The distinction between the United States Government as a contractor and a private individual is that the Government is not bound by a contract unless it is in writing, signed at the end thereof by the proper officer and accompanied by an affidavit that the contracting party is not interested therein. That is not so with a private individual, a partnership, or a corporation. A private contract may be in writing or it may be by parole; it may be express or it may be implied. In either case, however, the parties are bound by its terms, but not so with the United States Government; and so it happens, gentlemen of the committee, that on the 11th of November, when Germany suddenly collapsed and when this armistice was quickly signed, there were 6,600 of these agreements to purchase war supplies that had not been reduced to the formality of written contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] to grant me five minutes, which he promised to do.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I did promise the gentleman five minutes, and I told the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that he could use whatever time I had left, and in his absence I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, is it right, is it fair, to repudiate these informal contracts or obligations of the United States Government arising out the conditions that I have briefly stated? No private contractor, no corporation or individual, would repudiate them. They would be taken up at once for adjustment, and that is exactly what this bill proposes to do—to allow a proper, equitable, and just adjustment of these claims promptly and without delay or expense. It is true that they may involve more than mere compensation. It may be that it will involve a recompense for speculative damages or profits, and it ought to, if such profits can be justly shown to arise out of the contracts if properly carried out.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Has anybody contended at any time or anywhere upon this floor or any place that these contracts that were just and equitable should be repudiated by the Government?

Mr. ROBBINS. The contractors have been assailed here, I do not know whether by the gentleman or not——

Mr. McCULLOCH. Not by me or by anybody else that I heard.

Mr. ROBBINS. As if they were a band of harpies who came here to Washington to plunder the Government. I deny that; on the contrary they were patriotic. These men came here because they were summoned, in the first instance, to come here and help to prepare this Government to defend its very life, and, in the second instance, because this statute, entitled "An act to provide for the national defense," passed on June 3, 1916, compelled them to come here on the summons of a responsible officer of this Government and compelled them to turn their factories over as the War Department directed they should turn them over and devote them to the manufacture of munitions of war. If that be true, the question is, Who is to adjudicate these claims? That, I think, is the pivotal question arising here. I believe that no Member of Congress wants to be unjust or wants to put the United States Government in a position where it is not fair toward the men who have furnished the instruments, the accouterments and equipments with which our soldiers fought and won this war. We have a court established already, called the Court of Claims, and I took up with the clerk of that court the question whether or not this court could adjudicate these cases. It is a court particularly constituted and established to adjudicate and determine the justness of claims against the Government of the United States. It is established here in Washington exclusively for that purpose. I have a letter from the clerk of that court dated December 28, and he seems to object that I even questioned him as to whether they could adjudicate these claims. He tells me they are busy with cases growing out of the War of the Rebellion; the destruction of cotton and other things of that sort. I admit that if they are still working on cases growing out of the Civil War that then this court could not meet the emergency here, because what we want in these claims is promptness. One billion six hundred and seventy-five million dollars of unsettled claims against this Government can not and ought not to be held up at this time. We want prompt adjudication. The clerk of the court goes on to tell me that they have 57 cases appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and 684 cases are awaiting disposition, and he adds that where cases are promptly prepared they are tried and promptly disposed of in this court. I shall not take the time to read the letter at this time, but with the permission of the committee I herewith insert it as a part of my remarks:

UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS,
Washington, D. C., December 28, 1918.

Hon. EDWARD E. ROBBINS,
House of Representatives of the United States.

DEAR SIR: I am replying to your letter of December 23, in which you ask to be advised as to the condition of business in this court.

I am at a loss to know why this court is so frequently and continuously criticized for being slow in the transaction of its business. I think perhaps it is due to the fact that special acts of Congress from time to time confer jurisdiction on the court in cases which have been pending in the departments or before Congress for many years, and when it is known that they are pending before this court people jump to the conclusion, without investigation, that they have been pending here ever since they arose. A good illustration of this is the claims for abandoned and captured property taken by the Government from southern territory immediately after the Civil War. This court had jurisdiction of those cases at the time the property was taken and under the then existing law adjudicated and disposed of all of them. In 1911 a new and enlarged jurisdiction in these cases was conferred upon the court and some 500 of the cases came back here. I think it is the general impression throughout the country that they have been pending here ever since 1864.

Answering specifically the question as to the amount of undetermined business in this court, permit me to explain by way of introduction that many cases are filed in this court involving identically the same state of facts and the same question of law, and therefore the trial of only one case is necessary. I shall refer to these hereafter as class or group cases.

There are on the dockets of this court about a hundred cases filed before January 1, 1917. Of these about 50 are class or group cases, to be filed with other cases filed since January 1, 1917. The other 50 cases are undisposed of for various reasons which have appealed to the court as equitable; for instance, attorneys reprcsenting them have entered the military and naval service of the United States during this war and it has not been thought fair to press their cases to trial, and civil and military officers of the Government who are necessary witnesses in these cases are scattered about over the earth by reason of the war.

Of the cases filed since January 1, 1917, not falling under the class or group cases, but to be tried as individual cases, about 150 in various stages of preparation remain undecided. The trial of something like a dozen cases will dispose of the class or group cases.

There are pending in the Supreme Court of the United States on appeals from this court 57 cases, and there are 684 cases in this court awaiting the action of the Supreme Court on said appeals and which will be disposed of promptly in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court.

In this court, as in all other courts, the speed with which the court disposes of its business must in some manner depend upon the speed with which cases are prepared for trial. This court has a rule, I believe, not usual in other Federal courts, of calling its docket from time to time and ordering the parties on pain of dismissal of the cases to get them ready promptly. On the first day of the present term, December 3, 1918, the court entered an order in all cases filed prior to June 1, 1918, in which no steps had been taken for the preparation of the cases for trial, that the same be set for trial for December 16, 1918, and on that day dismissed all cases in which no preparation had been made unless reasonable assurance was given that preparation would be promptly made.

Permit me to add that when a case is prepared and stands for trial in this court it is usually reached within a few weeks, and when argued and submitted is decided within a few weeks later. From this summary you will see that this court is probably as near abreast of its business as any State or Federal court in the country.

I have referred above to the abandoned and captured property cases. These are claims for cotton taken by agents of the United States Government immediately after the war and sold, and the proceeds turned into the Treasury of the United States. The jurisdiction of this court under the act of 1911 is to render judgment not to exceed the proceeds in the Treasury of the United States. That act gave the claimants until January 1, 1918, to file their cases, and in order that the aggregate of the judgments of this court might not exceed the sum in the Treasury it was considered necessary to defer the adjudication of the cases until all cases were filed or barred from being filed by the statute of limitations. In the meantime, there were several questions which required adjudication in a preliminary way; for instance, much of this cotton which was claimed by individual claimants was shown by the archives of the Confederate Government, now in the possession of the United States, to have been sold to the Confederate Government for Confederate bonds. It was necessary to determine whether this was a valid sale, divesting the claimant of title to the cotton. That question was decided by this court adversely to the individual claimants, and on appeal was affirmed by the Supreme Court and its mandate was filed in this court on May 27, 1918. On December 3, 1918, the court set down for hearing all of these cotton cases—443 in number—for December 18, 1918. On that day 210 cases were dismissed and 5 cases argued and submitted to the court. The remainder of the cases are set for Monday, January 6, and the trial of about a half dozen of them will practically determine the entire cotton jurisdiction.

I hope this gives you the information you desire, and if it does not I shall be pleased to furnish you anything else within my power.

Respectfully,

SAML. A. PUTMAN, Chief Clerk.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. DENISON. As a matter of fact, of course, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as a lawyer, knows that the Court of Claims has no jurisdiction to hear and determine any of these claims involved in this bill unless Congress should give it jurisdiction.

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly; and that is why I obtained the letter. We would have to pass an act of Congress turning these claims over to the Court of Claims for disposition. Do not misunderstand me. I hope I made that clear, and if I did not I do so now. I understand it perfectly well. We are passing an act of Congress establishing not a judicial tribunal but establishing an authority, consisting of the Secretary of War, to pass on these claims; and if we are not satisfied with that, by amendment to this act of Congress we can place them in the hands of the Court of Claims.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman does not think these claims will be adjusted by the Secretary of War himself, does he?

Mr. ROBBINS. This act provides that he shall examine into them, and I know that he is not going to adjust 6,660 claims himself. If the gentleman has visited any of the industrial plants, he must know that in every one of them there was an officer of this Government standing by and inspecting every particle of war material that was manufactured before it was sent out. The War Department already has the information and the organization to promptly investigate and properly and justly decide all these claims, and ought to be allowed to do so.

And you will know also that there is no source of information so valuable as that which is under the control of the War Department, by reason of its not only making these contracts but by reason of the fact that it has inspected war material made under the contracts from time to time.

It must be borne in mind also that the War Department was compelled to expand its personnel from less than 1,000 clerks to some eight or ten thousand clerks. Many of these are inexperienced men. This could not be avoided, and in the great haste to get war materials orders were necessarily given by letter, by telegraph, and in many instances over the telephone. The work was new. It was done under great pressure, the orders being to win the war at all cost. Get the guns, munitions, and equipment for our brave boys on the battle line, and in the haste and zeal to carry out these orders the contracts were not all reduced to writing, as required by the three thousand seven hundred and forty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes, and signed at the end thereof, and having thereto attached an affidavit that the parties signing were not interested. When these informal contracts were presented to the Comptroller of the Treasury for payment they were promptly refused on the ground that they were not contracts such as were required by the Revised Statutes and binding upon the Government. Moreover, by the sudden declaration of peace on November 11 it became impossible to complete these contracts. The Comptroller of the Treasury ruled as follows:

There are in the hands of contractors many informal papers, such as letters, purchase orders, procurement orders, etc. These papers generally are intended to be and are preliminary to the execution of contracts. In themselves they place no obligation on the Government. The latter may be liable on a quantum meruit for the fair value of articles delivered and accepted, but it has no legal obligation for expenses incurred, value of incomplete work, material on hand or arranged for, etc., unless a contract in legal form has been made. Of course it is understood a legal contract can not be made now for articles the Government does not need, and this is true regardless of prior negotiations or understandings, written or oral.

This ruling made it impossible to execute in a formal manner these contracts, and hence, as the comptroller says at another places in his ruling, "cases involving only equitable claims can not be settled by executive officers without new legislation," and it is necessary to pass this act and place the settlements of these claims in the hands of some tribunal, or refer them to some one with authority to adjust and settle them.

The Secretary of War is the most competent official to take charge of this matter. He has the machinery. These contractors were summoned by his department to make the contracts for which claim is now made. The contracts were not formally executed, because the officials of his department were unable, for lack of time or information, to complete these contracts. It is a maxim of the law, "Where one of two innocent parties must suffer, he whose act caused the loss should bear it." In this case, certainly the contractors who furnished the goods are not to blame. The Government will make no contract except on forms approved by the Attorney General. The War Department itself could not make the contracts because of lack of time and lack of information, but relying on the good faith of the War Department, moved by a patriotic devotion to do their utmost for the Government in time of stress, these 6,600 citizens provided munitions of war or furnished something of value to the Government or prepared to render service for the purpose of aiding in the prosecution of the war against our enemies. It would be an act of bad faith now to refuse to pay merely because the contract is not in writing on the form prescribed by law in order to bind the Government.

In many of these cases large sums of money were tied up, and financial embarrassment will in many cases overtake these claimants if prompt relief is not extended to them. They have been compelled to pay for labor, material, insurance, and transportation, all of which was necessary expense in the production of the munitions, supplies, and equipment manufactured and furnished to the Government and used in the prosecution of the war.

I do not believe the people of the United States want any such claims repudiated and those who furnished the material either financially embarrassed or driven into bankruptcy, and I do not believe that this Congress should for a moment tolerate any action that would bring about such a direful result.

We must place our confidence in the War Department and permit it to promptly take up and adjudicate these claims. This act amply protects the Government. The claims must be presented within six months, only fair value is to be paid for the product, only the actual cost incurred in the preparation for the manufacture of war supplies is to be allowed. Great care is taken not to confer jurisdiction on courts, so that the Secretary of War is practically the final arbiter in all these cases, and where criminality or fraud is discovered criminal prosecutions are preserved against the malefactors.

I favor the passage of this bill because I believe it is just, and I believe that the Secretary of War will promptly carry out its provisions and pay these just claimants who have aided the Government at the time of its distress.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the bill will pass.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the question involved here is a business one and not a political question, and it is a most important business question to contractors and the business community, and by discussing it from the political standpoint and criticizing either the Secretary of War or anyone else we jeopardize the interests of this great body in the community in which we are interested at this time. Now, let us see. The question here is a very narrow one. In the first place, it is provided by the bill in the Senate, which will be offered as a substitute here, that in all cases where goods have been delivered the goods can be paid for by the Secretary of War, and there will be referred to the commission provided for in that bill only cases where damages are involved.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. For a question.

Mr. SANFORD. Perhaps the gentleman could be assisted in his argument if he knows that the Senate committee has just withdrawn that bill, revised its judgment, abolished the commission plan——

Mr. DEMPSEY. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. SANFORD. That is the information I get.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I doubt the statement of the gentleman from New York. I heard the same report upon the floor yesterday, and I went over with the gentleman from Illinois and we inquired of Senator HITCHCOCK and found that it had not been withdrawn; that it had passed the Senate committee unanimously.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman had better go over again.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I beg not to be interrupted.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will yield after a moment. So that under that bill there is a very narrow question presented. It is simply a question of referring to a commission disputed claims, claims which involve damages, claims which are in their nature judicial. I call the attention of the committee to the argument of the chairman of the committee, which was twofold. He said, first, we should refer these claims to the Secretary of War because the Secretary already has considered $15,000,000,000 of claims, and why not add a billion and a half more? Why, it seems to me you could not possibly present a better argument for withdrawing from the consideration of the Secretary this billion and a half of disputed claims. Is it an argument to say that because a man is already overburdened and overloaded with work you should add to his shoulders that which he clearly can not do? Now, I am not saying a word in the way of criticism at all. We all know the difficulties which the War Department had in performing its ordinary work.

We all know the difficulties which the insurance department had, and we all know the difficulties the allotment division had. It was all admitted here on the floor only two or three days ago when a bill introduced by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia was under consideration. Do you know only two days ago the Secretary of War appeared before a committee and said he had added 3,000 clerks within a few weeks last past, and he was about to add a thousand more? Why should you add to his work?

Then the chairman of the committee said, second, we should refer these to the Secretary of War because the parties will get together, and he said he could not understand the position of the gentleman from Ohio, that the question was not a judicial one, that he could not see why two business men should not get together. Why, suppose that I and another business man have a dispute, and I know that the other business man is judge as well as party, that he can absolutely determine the question, that I have to submit to his determination. Is that a getting together? Is that a standing of the parties on an equality? Does not that involve a judicial determination and is not that a judicial determination by one of the parties to the controversy against the other party to the controversy? Is not that the real situation and not the situation presented by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman contend if this bill is passed by Congress that the contractor will be compelled to accept its benefits?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I contend if this bill is passed by the committee the procedure as laid down by the chairman is this: That in case of any dispute the matter is referred to a subordinate committee in the War Department, and some small employee who receives a small salary, and in case the committee finds against the chairman he can appeal to another committee of subordinate employees in the department from that decision. I contend this, that in neither case is the class of employees the class of men who are fitted to pass upon questions of this kind which involve judicial discretion, which involve ability of a high order, which involve also acting in a way of absolute indifference on the part of the party, an ability to determine without being interested in any way; and instead of that if you refer it to one party who is interested by that proceeding the contractor may be apt not to get a fair, honest, judicial determination of this claim to which he is honestly and fairly entitled and which is what this House wants to give him.

Mr. DENT. Yes; but the gentleman has never yet answered my question, that if this bill becomes a law will the contractor be compelled to accept its benefits? If the Secretary of War does not give him that to which he thinks he is entitled he will still have recourse——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Whether he will have to accept it as an ultimate result or not, should he be compelled first to face the finding of facts by one of the parties and then go to a court with an adverse finding of facts? He must face two trials instead of one, and should he face a second trial with a finding of facts against him we all know it will be practically impossible to reverse the finding of facts, while it may be easy to reverse the finding upon the law. In other words, under this bill you force upon him at the best two trials and you force him to go into an appellate court with a finding of facts against him.

Mr. DENT. That same thing applies to $15,000,000,000 worth of contracts.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman's argument is twofold. He says, first, because this man is overburdened with the consideration of $15,000,000,000 worth of contracts we should load him down with a billion and a half more. And he says, second, that a fair trial is a trial where you make one of the parties to the controversy the judge, and he says that that is two business men getting together. And I say that is not at all the situation. When you make one of two business men judge as well as party, you are not giving the other party that fair and just determination to which he is entitled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] on yesterday, in making his adroit argument in favor of this bill, spent the major portion of his time dealing with a proposition about which there is not the slightest dispute in this House, and gave very scant consideration to the only question about which there is dispute.

No man who is honest will deny that every just claim against this Government, whether it be the claim of a contractor or anybody else, should be paid. Every man who is honest will admit that all just claims should be paid promptly. There should be no delay about it. Payment should be made just as quickly as it can be done equitably and justly to all concerned. But the only question in dispute here is who should settle the claims. Now, why is it that the claims aggregating $1,600,000,000 have not been paid? Why is it that the Comptroller of the Treasury has refused to pay them? He has refused to pay them because there were irregularities. Now, the chairman of the committee would have the House believe that all of the irregularities were trivial; but according to the charges and statements that have been made upon the floor of this House during the course of this debate all of the irregularities are not trivial. They were not mere informalities in procedure. It was charged here yesterday that there were irregularities that might, if pursued and carefully investigated, involve criminality. In view of the fact that the Comptroller of the Treasury has refused to pay these bills because of irregularities, and in view of the further fact that the charge has been made upon this floor that those irregularities were not mere informalities but went deeper, is not that enough to place the representatives of the people, who are charged with safeguarding the funds of the United States, upon guard and give them notice?

Is not that sufficient to make you men here, who are charged with this great responsibility under the Constitution, place about the settlement of these claims every reasonable safeguard? Is it the part of good judgment or good business or is it common sense for you to say, "We will disregard all that; let the Secretary of War and the officers who are responsible for the irregularities go ahead and settle them"? Let them cover up, if you please, the fact that they failed to file the affidavit which would prove, or tend to prove, that they had no personal or pecuniary interest in the contract they were entering into for the Government. To my way of thinking, the safeguard that requires the filing of an affidavit that the officer has no interest in the contract he is making is most important, as are many other checks and balances provided by law, which, it appears from this debate, have been either evaded or disregarded by officers. I do not want to see this Government permit its officers to enter into contracts with themselves or their former employers without being called to account and the transaction carefully examined into from all angles. I do not believe it is a good thing to be lax or indifferent about those matters. Therefore I believe that there should be some provision in this bill which will safeguard these settlements but not delay them.

I am in favor of the amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], which requires a committee to assist in the settlement of these contracts. I can not now give the language of the amendment, but it provides for a committee which shall have the power to authorize payment of all claims. It does not take away from the Secretary of War any power, except that it supervises the settlement. It would not cause any delay, because under the act all these claims must be paid by June 30, 1919. There will be no delay about it; there will be no injustice about it. It simply means that the Congress is placing a safeguard around the settlement of these claims, which it is its plain duty to do.

Now, I do not say that I will not vote for this bill if it is not amended, because I think all just claims ought to be paid and paid promptly, but being on notice, the charges referred to having been made, it is our duty to see to it, in so far as we can, that proper safeguards are placed around the payment of these vast sums of the people's money, and the chairman of the committee, in my opinion, should accept the Moore amendment without a single word of protest.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes; I will.

Mr. DENT. What is the amendment? I did not get it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. It is an amendment the exact language of which I can not give you, but which was referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] last night before we adjourned. It provides that there shall be a committee composed in part of Members of Congress—of the House and Senate—which committee shall supervise the settlement of these claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. It is not, then, to create a commission?

Mr. McCULLOCH. No; it is a different proposition entirely.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, in the presence of a great number of things to be criticized, I know there is an irresistible temptation to use such an occasion as this bill presents to indulge in criticism. I am not going to find fault with anyone who has seen fit to use this occasion for that purpose, although I think that there is far less ground for criticism in connection with this particular matter than with many others. If those who are inclined to criticize the War Department rely upon criticism of this character, such as informalities in contracts, and thus indicate that there are no more serious matters to be criticized, in my judgment they substantially give away their case.

There will undoubtedly be a time for proper investigation and criticism of expenditures under the War Department. There will be an opportunity to inquire as to whether those expenditures have been made wisely and whether we have had a full return for our money.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. In just a moment.

It does not seem to me, however, that this is the occasion. I think we shall make a great mistake if we choose this absolutely necessary legislation as a vehicle and occasion for general criticism of the wisdom or lack of wisdom in the expenditures of the War Department.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe that it is better to have the commission now to pass upon these claims as to their justness than, after they are paid, to appoint an investigating committee to determine whether or not they have been rightfully paid?

Mr. TILSON. I do not. I think it would be far better to make mistakes in the payment of a few claims that ought not to be paid than to withhold payment upon a billion and a half of just claims, when such delay is a substantial denial of justice. If afterwards it should be revealed that a few are erroneous, even then it is possible in most cases to right the wrong. In other words, it would be better to make a few mistakes now than to do the injustice of holding up hundreds and thousands of claims which mean so much, not only to the contractors, but to the general business of the country.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. For a question; I yield.

Mr. SNYDER. In other words, the gentleman means just what I attempted to state, that it is better to pay 75 or 85 per cent of these just claims, even if errors are made, on account of the great necessity on the part of the contractors in having the money that is due them.

Mr. TILSON. Yes. The whole question is this: Shall we put the United States Government in the position of being able to do what any honest, reputable business man would do under like circumstances? Under governmental restrictions and laws, some of them proper and some of them in my judgment useless, the War Department is hampered in doing what an individual would do under like circumstances. By this legislation we simply permit the Government to do what any honest business man in private life would do under similar circumstances and for which he would be considered a crook if he failed to do.

Let us assume the case of two business men, one a building contractor conducting large operations, the other a man who furnishes supplies. Suppose there was a great fire or an earthquake and great structures are necessary immediately. The contractor goes hurriedly to the man who furnishes supplies and in the haste of the occasion there are informal contracts—items of supplies furnished in the confusion concerning which it is not easy to find out what are the real facts in the case. What would they do? Men representing these two concerns would immediately come together and in a very short time they would adjust the matter and go on with their business. Owing to the restrictions that I have mentioned, the Government can not do that. We propose to authorize the Secretary of War to do just that by this legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Not now. Let us consider this legislation under three heads: First, what is for the best interest of the country at large as distinguished from the interests of the Government as representing the taxpayers and from the interests of the contractors themselves? What is best for the people as a whole? As we all know, industrial conditions are abnormal on account of the war. Capital has been tied up in war work and labor has been earning its bread in war activities. It is highly important for all that at the earliest possible moment the capital thus tied up be released so that business may resume its normal course. Those who may choose to oppose legislation absolutely necessary for this return to normal business conditions will assume a serious responsibility.

Second. What is best for the Government and the Treasury? It will surely be for the best interests of the taxpayers to settle these claims as soon as possible. Claimants will accept less if they can get it promptly in order to return to their peace-time business. They can afford to take less, and less will be due, for if prompt settlement is not made interest and resulting damages must and should be added. It is a well-known fact that claims for damages grow in geometrical progression with the time taken for settlement.

Third. What is fair and right as between the Government representing all the people and an individual or group of individuals? Delay in settlement means distress or financial ruin for many honest, patriotic creditors who placed their all at the disposal of the Government in order to win the war. We can not afford to place the Government in the attitude of a shifty, evasive, delinquent debtor. If legislation effecting substantially the purposes of this bill is not speedily enacted, we shall do just that thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the committee is borrowing trouble in insisting upon the passage of this bill as it is worded.

If the committee will classify these claims and separate those claims where the goods have been delivered in toto, providing that the proper affidavits are filed, and permit the Secretary of War to pay such claims, I am sure there is no objection on the part of any Member of this House to the payment of such claims.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. You are wasting time there, because this bill is not necessary to pay for goods that have been delivered. The War Department has authority to pay for them now under an implied contract.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Good. Now, then, we come to the class of cases where the goods have not been delivered, and while some of these claims are made in absolute good faith and the claimants are entitled to payment we are going to have a large number of claimants that will come in and try to seek profits which they would have gained if the war had continued, and for goods which they manufactured on speculation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] suggested that perhaps 75 per cent of the claims are good, and he asks, "Why not pay 75 per cent of the claims and let the other 25 per cent follow in?" The trouble is that the 75 per cent of honest claims will amount to 25 per cent of the amount and the 25 per cent of dishonest claims will amount to 75 per cent of the amount we will appropriate. I want to protect the Treasury against dishonest claims.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. I know of a case where in my own personal experience there was an implied contract. The material was offered. I found the material defective and rejected every bit of it. This manufacturer could come in and claim a million dollars and call me as a star witness. I hear he is now seeking to adjust that claim for a hundred thousand dollars, and that is every cent he is entitled to, if that much.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to know if the gentleman can point out any particular case that is so glaringly dishonest.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly. Let us take the case of the raincoats in New York, where, if we should follow the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] to have the Government inspector adjust these claims, we would have to go to the Federal penitentiary in Atlanta to have this man pass upon the claim of the fraudulent manufacturer.

I introduced here on the first day of the Sixty-fifth Congress, my first day in this House, a bill which would have sent that dishonest contractor and that dishonest inspector to the gallows, and not to jail; but you did not have courage enough to pass upon it. It is still sleeping in committee. What we want to do is to separate the dishonest claims from the honest claims. Why let the Department of War pass upon it? You say this is purely a commercial proposition, in the cases of unliquidated claims; I consider it is a judicial proposition. Let the Secretary of Commerce pass upon it, and let the Attorney General look after the interests of the Government.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How would the gentleman's bill send somebody to the gallows?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I introduced a bill on the first day of the Sixty-fifth Congress providing death penalty for dishonest contractors, to anyone who defrauded the Government in contracts in time of war. That is the logical, decent thing to do. Hang the man who will defraud his own country in time of war, while his countrymen are dying for it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You mean to send somebody to the gallows for a crime committed before or after the passage of the law?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows you can not pass a criminal law which is ex post facto.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I asked the gentleman that question because I thought the gentleman intimated that we could.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman could not possibly have misunderstood what I said.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman possibly did not express himself as clearly as he intended.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is a difference of opinion between us. I "have" given that subject considerable study, more than many certain learned committees that had no experience and no information as to what they were trying to do, and refused to listen to others when they passed a very poor bill. I trust I have made myself clear on that point. [Laughter.]

Now, if the Senate comes back with this bill as it now stands, and takes out the amendment providing for a reviewing commission, I shall support the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. Otherwise it is our duty to defeat this bill as it stands, and let the committee come in with a logical bill to look after the interests of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, this bill contains 15 lines. There are 15 lines in the bill proper and 45 lines in the provisos. There are 8 provisos to the bill as it has been reported, and I understand it is the intention of the chairman of the committee to offer one or two more, so that when the bill is finally voted upon it will be a bill consisting of 15 lines itself and 50 or 60 lines of provisos, all of which shows, at least to my way of thinking, that we are trying to do something by this bill that we ought not to do. Any bill that contains only 15 lines and that has 50 or 60 lines of separate provisos is, to say the least, a rather unusual bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Provisos inserted after the bill was introduced?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. All of these provisos were added by the committee after the bill was introduced.

Now, as a Member of this House, I am not going to vote for any bill that will authorize or empower any man who has been a party to an illegal contract to settle unliquidated damages growing out of that illegal contract. [Applause.] And that is just exactly what this bill does in its present form. There were a number of speeches made here yesterday which tried to leave the impression with the House that the only difference between the claims that will be settled under this bill and those that have been settled under legal contracts is a mere matter of informality.

Gentlemen, that is misleading. That is sugar-coating the whole proposition. Let me tell you what this bill does. The War Department now has the authority to settle for any materials that the Government has actually received, I do not care whether under a legal contract or an illegal contract. The War Department already has that power, and the Court of Claims has jurisdiction to settle every liquidated or unliquidated damage claim growing out of any legal contract; but the Court of Claims has no jurisdiction to settle any one of the claims covered by this bill; neither has the War Department jurisdiction to do so, because the claims that are to be settled under this bill are so-called equitable claims and are not legal claims growing out of any express or implied legal contracts. Now, if I have the time I want to call your attention to this provision in the act of Congress that was passed during the Civil War; and it has been rather amusing to me to see the members of the Military Affairs Committee of this House standing here and saying that this law was an obstruction to the War Department and that we ought to disregard it, although it is a valid existing law. That law provided that any officer in the War Department who signed a contract purchasing supplies for the Government should file with it his affidavit that he had no interest in the contract, direct or indirect, and that he should file with the department all bids, offers, and advertisements, and so forth, connected with the letting of the contract. Now, I would like to have some members of the Military Affairs Committee who have been belittling this law explain to the House what the purpose of it was. This law was passed by the Congress for some good purpose, and if it is not a good law it ought to be repealed, and I do not believe in letting the department ignore it absolutely when it is a valid existing law passed to protect the people and the Government.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. DENT] stood here yesterday and said that there is no difference between the contracts to be settled under this bill and those that are valid except a mere informality. Why, gentlemen of the House, if there has been any dishonesty in connection with the letting of war contracts—and I have heard a great deal of talk, and so have you, about graft and dishonesty in connection with the letting of some of these contracts—this bill will whitewash the whole thing.

The act of Congress under which these thousands of war contracts are absolutely void and illegal was passed in 1862, during the Civil War. It is a statute of frauds, as the Supreme Court has said, enacted for the very purpose of protecting the Government against fraud and dishonesty on the part of Government officials. It provides that all contracts made with the Government must be signed by the officer who makes the contracts, and he must attach to the contract an affidavit to the effect that he has no interest, direct or indirect, in the contract. He must also file with the contract, and attached to it, all offers, bids, advertisements for bids, and all other papers connected with the letting of the contract.

Now, here are nearly 7,000 contracts that we already know of, involving several billion dollars, that everyone of them are illegal and worthless because they were not signed by the officers who made them, nor were the affidavits of such officers made and filed with them, nor were the bids and other data filed as required by law. In other words, this statute of frauds, enacted to protect the public Treasury, was entirely ignored and disregarded, and Members stand here and argue that this default on the part of the officers of the War Department was a mere informality. If this bill is passed, all kinds of padded, fraudulent, and dishonest claims for damages, both actual and speculative and imaginary will be presented, and in my judgment they will aggregate twice as much as has been estimated by the War Department.

The idea that Congress should by law authorize the same officers of the War Department who have made these illegal contracts and failed to do their duty to the Government to settle the claims for damages that will be presented under them is preposterous to me. Now, I am in favor of paying every single just claim any person has against the Government, and doing so promptly. None of us, I think, want to deny to anyone a prompt settlement of his legitimate claim growing out of any expense he has incurred or liability he has contracted in helping the Government in the prosecution of the war.

But the end to be accomplished does not always justify the means provided to accomplish it. Let us provide for the payment of all these claims that are proper just as promptly as is possible. But let us also protect the people we are representing and guard the public Treasury while we are doing so. Surely Congress can adequately provide for the settlement of these claims without necessarily letting the settlements be left to the very officers who made the illegal contracts—who failed to do their duty when the contracts were made.

If this bill can be amended by the House so as to authorize some one else besides the War Department to make the settlements, I am willing to vote for it. If we can amend it so as to protect the Government from swollen and fraudulent claims, I will support it. But in its present form it is simply an omnibus whitewash, which I fear will in the end cover up a whole lot of waste, extravagance, graft, and possibly fraud; and, however urgent it may be that the valid claims ought to be settled promptly, I am unwilling to vote to allow them all to be settled in the manner provided by the bill in its present form.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take the time of the committee in a discussion of this bill, but there are a few things that have been touched upon that I think ought to be brought to the attention of the House. In the first place, the same action that is proposed in this bill has been required of Congress, and the same duty has been performed by the Secretary of War, following the Civil War and also the Spanish-American War. The chairman of the committee [Mr. DENT] read to the House yesterday the legislation similar to this enacted during the Civil War, and action exactly similar to that intended at this time was taken by the Secretary of War in settling claims against the Government following the Spanish-American War; and the Spanish War claims were carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the action of the Secretary of War was declared valid by the highest court in the land. So we have got warrant for what we are seeking to do.

Now, there is one thing particularly that I want to impress upon the House, because I think we have had an erroneous idea of it presented here, and that is that these claims are to be adjusted by the men who were responsible for making the contracts. That is not correct. On the contrary, 34 regional boards have already been constituted by the Secretary of War. They are civilian boards, made up of the representative business men of the different communities in which they are acting. For instance, in the city of Chicago and for that region John J. Mitchell, president of the great Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, is a member of the board. These men are already acting. They are men selected because of their high character and sound business judgment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where is there anything in the pending bill that will insure the appointment of a commission headed by John J. Mitchell, or of which he is a member?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. This bill authorizes the Secretary of War to adjust these claims, and the Secretary of War has already constituted these boards, and Mr. Mitchell is a member of one of them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly; but this bill does not authorize the Secretary of War to appoint anybody.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. These boards are already settling the claims which have arisen from formal contracts.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to get into the RECORD——

Mr. LITTLE. If what the gentleman has stated is true, why do we not pass a law to authorize the appointment of these commissions?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. You are authorizing it when you pass this bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Why not say so in the law then?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Secretary of War is authorized to do so. It has already been done. And I want to say further that I have here a statement showing that 685,872 contracts and purchasing orders were executed during this war. In other words, almost 700,000 contracts and purchasing orders have been made by the War Department with the different business men of this country, and only 6,000 of them are unconsummated and at issue in this particular case and to be settled under the terms of this bill.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a very brief question?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have only five minutes. Just wait until I finish my statement, and then if I can I will yield. I want to get this into the RECORD. I asked the Secretary of War and the Assistant Secretary of War and the munitions director if there was any evidence before the War Department that one single one of these so-called informal contracts was tainted with fraud, in the opinion of the War Department, and their reply to me was that so far as they knew there was not one scintilla of evidence that a single one of these contracts was tainted with fraud, but that every contract as to which there had been any suggestion of fraud was a valid, formal contract. Therefore there is no warrant for the insinuation, and no evidence to imply that there is any suggestion of fraud in connection with these particular informal contracts. They were caught unfulfilled by the armistice, and that is the reason for this legislation.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to make one more statement. The proposition is made, in controverting our plan, to create a commission. A commission means delay, interminable delay and enormous expense. We now have boards composed of high-class business men operating all over the country settling the formal contracts. If any man were to come before Congress and propose to constitute two commissions—one to settle one class of contracts which are valid and another commission to settle claims in controversy, I do not think he would have any hearing before the House. But that is what you propose to do if you appoint a commission. You will have the commission and also these regional boards of high-class business men, who are settling valid claims.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. In that connection a statement was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] a little while ago, that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs had recalled the Hitchcock bill. That statement is absolutely correct. A member of the Senate Military Committee called me over the phone a little while ago and informed me that the Senate Military Committee had recalled the Hitchcock bill and abandoned the commission proposition.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. Can the gentleman give the House any light as to who these 6,500 people are making these claims?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; I have not that information. A few of them were mentioned casually in the hearings. They are representative men and business corporations scattered all over the country who were doing things necessary for the United States to win the war.

Mr. KING. Are there any aircraft contracts in this proposition?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I was informed by the Assistant Secretary of War that, as far as he could state, the Hughes investigation aircraft contracts are not included in this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Did the War Department furnish the committee with any data as to who the men are that have these informal contracts and the names of the officers on the part of the Government who are supposed to have made the contracts?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We had only a general statement; no detailed list was made. That list is being prepared, but it will take some time. We were given a brief summary of the entire amount, about a billion and a half of money and something like 6,600 contracts, scattered all over the country.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman think that Congress ought to know who composes the boards that the gentleman has referred to?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say that these boards have all been appointed and are known and now acting upon the formal contract claims.

Mr. DOWELL. We have not that knowledge.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as I stated yesterday, I am anxious that all legitimate contracts shall be paid as promptly as possible. There ought to be no delay. People who have done service for the Government during the war should receive their money, but I believe there should be some supervision over so large a transaction as this. There really should be a limitation put upon the total amount to be expended. All we know is that it is to approximate $1,600,000,000, but I have heard rumors that it may run up to $4,000,000,000. Being on the revenue-raising committee, that strikes me as a serious matter. Business men are appealing to us to reduce taxes, and this seems to be an effort to increase taxes. Something has been said about the amendment that I propose to offer and concerning which notice was given late last evening. I wish to explain the amendment, and in explaining I desire to say that it should not embarrass the Secretary of War in the slightest particular, nor cause any delay whatever, but if adopted, it seems to me that it will satisfy the Congress and satisfy the people at large. The amendment does not alter the present bill in any respect, except that it creates a committee on war-contract expenditures. Following the syllabus of the bill, it inserts the following:

> There is hereby created a committee on war-contract expenditures, to consist of the Secretary of War, two Members of the Senate, one a Democrat and one a Republican, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and four Members of the House of Representatives, two Democrats and two Republicans, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I think I shall add to the committee the Attorney General, along with the Secretary of War, so that the legal department will be represented in the approval of these claims. That clause creates a committee on war-contract expenditures.

Section 2 provides that the Secretary of War, "with the approval of the committee on war-contract expenditures," which we have just created, is authorized to do all that this bill proposes. So that there is absolutely no hindrance, no stumbling block placed in the way of the Secretary of War.

All that we do is to satisfy the people and satisfy the Congress that there will be some intelligent supervision of these more than 6,600 contract claims. What will the Secretary of War do under these conditions? Once a week, or once in two weeks, or once a month, if he pleases, he may call together this committee on war-contract expenditures. They will assemble, and if the Secretary is ready with his audited accounts, with his bills, or his statements, he will lay them before the committee, and they will say, "All right, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 10, 20, or 100 contracts are clear as a whistle; we are satisfied with the audit and they should be paid."

We authorize them to be paid; but No. 59, No. 62, No. 1132 do not look exactly right to us and are laid aside for further information. What hindrance is there; what stumbling block in the way of the Secretary with an arrangement like that? What objection can any honest man have to it? Why would it not be a relief to the Secretary of War to have the sanction of the Attorney General and of the Representatives of the Congress in this regard? That is all the amendment proposes. There is no delay in settlement, and every condition of the bill will be followed.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. EAGLE. I would like to say to the gentleman that I should favor his amendment if I were convinced of one point, and, therefore, I ask in good faith to have his views on that point. It is in my own mind as a reason against the amendment, otherwise the amendment seems to me to be sound. I doubt if there is a single Member of the 435 of us who, with his committee work, with his attendance here from noon until 6 o'clock each day, with his from 50 to 150 letters each day and from 5 to 10 or 20 telegrams each day——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman should ask his question.

Mr. EAGLE. Oh, I want to get this off my chest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will ask for more time for me I am satisfied.

Mr. EAGLE. I will beg hard. Is not each Member so loaded with responsibility that any one of the four appointed would find it almost impossible to give a fair, intelligent, judicial investigation to any one of these claims of the whole 6,700? Now, is it fair to appoint four men and charge them in the eyes of the country with the knowledge and responsibility which lack of time probably will not permit them to fulfill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman put his question in good faith, but in putting it he has made an argument. I think I can answer it by saying that no Member of Congress, no matter how busy, will refuse to serve the country in this regard without compensation, and that is just exactly what I propose. I propose to leave it to the Speaker to appoint four men, two Republicans and two Democrats, and to the President of the Senate to appoint one Republican and one Democrat, and I venture to say that no man named by either of those gentlemen will refuse to serve in this capacity without compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All I wanted to do was to explain this amendment. It is a fair proposition and one which I think the House can very properly consider.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to appointing commissions for the purpose of investigating claims of this sort. It just means a divided responsibility and getting nowhere. Now, the suggestion which has just been made to the House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] of appointing a commission of Congressmen to act with and supervise the Secretary of War is wholly fallacious, it seems to me, so far as any practical results are concerned. If this House is anxious to do what ought to be done, then what it desires to do is to pay every honest and just claim with as much speed as possible, but to submit every claim to proper investigation to know what you are talking about. I am not going to spend any time answering the argument of those gentlemen here who say we ought to turn this thing over to a commission of bankers and manufacturers, who have these contracts, and let them decide themselves what they ought to have. I think it is a perfectly foolish or worse proposition for a Member of Congress to stand on the floor of this House and advocate to intelligent men. It is not necessary to indict these people for crime; it is not necessary to charge anybody with dishonesty. What we actually know is that there are 6,600 claims here, aggregating $1,600,000,000. Of course, we want them paid, but this House is here supposed to represent the public interest, and if it is necessary to take time and investigate these claims, and, of course, it is necessary, whatever time is required ought to be taken and this talk about stopping the wheels of progress and ruining business men is a fallacious sort of argument that is designed to prevent these claims being examined properly and the amount actually and properly due determined. Now, of course, it is not very strange that men come here and say that they need the money, but that is not a new thing with Congress. I suppose the older Members who have been here for years have been confronted with that right along. But the question for us to determine is what is our duty in this matter. I say that our duty is to require investigation of these things. I have been very strongly of the opinion, and am yet, that there ought to be an investigation amounting to a judicial inquiry. Of course, they say it will take time. Of course it will, but Congress is not going to vote any lump sums here to anybody without any knowledge of the facts unless provision is made for a possible tribunal for determining the question. Now, of course, the War Department is one of the executive departments of the Government. This bill is advocated here upon the ground that the man upon whom the authority is conferred will not exercise it. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] said they had a commission appointed of a prominent banker in Chicago and somebody else and what they were going to do, but this bill does not confer any authority on any other man.

It says the Secretary of War. Of course, there is just this difference between conferring authority upon a Cabinet officer and conferring it on a court. The court can not delegate its authority, while the Cabinet officer can; but, of course, no pretense is made that the Secretary of War as a lawyer is going to sit down and make investigation of these claims before they are approved; no pretense of that sort is made. I take it we ought to amend this bill. It will help it some by providing that before any claim under this bill shall be allowed the Attorney General shall certify in writing upon the bill that the allowance of it is authorized by this statute which we now are passing or something to that effect, and I wish the gentlemen of the House would consider that, as I think it will be an additional safeguard. Of course, if these 6,600 claimants came here to Congress individually and introduced a bill to pay their claims in the regular order, the bill would go to the Court of Claims. They would write to the War Department, get a report on that particular claim, and they would probably report it back to Congress with the recommendation of the War Department, and the War Department would get this information largely from the sources relied on under this bill; but the truth about it is gentlemen come to Washington and parade certain claims concerning which there is no dispute and ask this Congress to pass a blanket authority to pay 6,700, about only two or three of which we know anything.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose there are claims not yet presented?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, unquestionably. When we had this hearing there was a million dollars' worth there and before the hearing was printed it reached $1,600,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand there are $4,000,000,000 not yet presented——

Mr. GORDON. I do not know about that; it is big enough as it is; but these claims ought not to be paid and they ought not to be authorized to be paid until they have been properly investigated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was not here yesterday, being in attendance upon the funeral of Col. Roosevelt, and I do not know just what the discussion was, but here is a question I would like to ask the gentleman. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs——

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I see from the record the gentleman from Alabama said:

Suppose that on the 15th day of October, if that was a week day, the Quartermaster's Department hired some manufacturer—

And so forth. And a little later he said:

Suppose on the same day a representative of the Ordnance Department sent a telegraphic order—

And so forth. They did some of that, did they not, by telephone?

Mr. GORDON That I do not know. Our committee has reported an amendment to this bill that will cut out the telephone conversations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Were there any of these orders given by dollar-a-year men in the War Department or in any department anywhere?

Mr. GORDON. I am not prepared to answer that question. There have been orders given by different individuals. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] had a conversation with somebody, and he is now present——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I wish to say that the aeroplanes were not accepted.

Mr. GORDON. You can not allow every Tom, Dick, and Harry to tell the people to make goods to win the war, and then present claims to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose the gentleman's contentions were correct and were carried out, and one of these claims should come regularly before the Claims Committee; for instance, of the House; the Claims Committee submits that to the War Department, and that department reports favorably on it. Is there a single instance of that kind where the Claims Committee would not bring it before the House and ask the House to pass it? So, after all, it is left to the Secretary of War.

Mr. GORDON. I think that is true, the only difference being in the aggregate amount. These amounts here aggregate over $1,600,000,000 up to date, and there are more than 6,600 claims. Now, the argument is made that any sort of judicial investigation will take too much time. The very claims that ought to be examined are likely to be passed without proper examination. You can not undertake to say that because 25 per cent of them are just or that 25 per cent are unjust we will authorize the payment of all of them. I do not think any sensible man with sound common sense or honesty will advocate any such proposition as that.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not this bill provide that these settlements have to be filed with Congress, stating the exact facts in connection with the settlement, after the settlement?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; afterwards.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman believe that any man in the War Department or any other official of the Government would enter into some shady arrangement under those conditions?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no. It is not the man in the War Department that is going to do it. It is the man that is getting the money that is going to do the shady things. I am not charging anybody in the War Department with intent to defraud.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not this bill also provide that if any gentleman does enter into this shady transaction we can pursue him?

Mr. GORDON. Of course, you can pursue him on a criminal indictment for felony if he conspires to defraud the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In France or England or Italy?

Mr. GORDON. In this country.

Mr. BENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. BENSON. What remedy does the gentleman offer?

Mr. GORDON. I think the bill ought to be amended in two particulars. I think that before being paid they ought to be approved by the Attorney General of the United States. I think, furthermore, they ought to be compelled to make this affidavit. A majority of these claims, it was testified, were rejected because the man who made the contract did not sign it and make the affidavit provided by law. I believe before these claims are paid that an affidavit ought to be made by the man who made the contract to the effect that no one but the Government and the contractor had any interest in it and that the terms claimed were agreed upon. And an amendment ought to be adopted so that he would be rendered liable to the same extent he would have been if he had signed and sworn to the contract in the original instance.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is this general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate; yes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my timo to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 27¼ minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this legislation is asked for by the War Department because there are some 6,600 agreements to be settled under this bill in this country alone, and the amount involved in these agreements is $1,600,000,000. It is a very large amount, and if these contracts or agreements had been formally executed according to law the War Department would not be put to the necessity of asking for this legislation.

On the 11th of November last year, when the news came that an armistice had been signed, the War Department did that which any good business house would have done. It immediately notified the contractors of the country right there and then to stop the further making of supplies that were being turned out to win the war. Now, those gentlemen who had contracts that were properly executed in accordance with the provisions of the Revised Statutes have had no trouble at all in getting a settlement. There are local boards composed of men in the various departments who have been engaged in supervising the actual production prepared for or carried on and who know the nature of the contracts. They call to their assistance the officers and Government inspectors, who watch the making of the supplies for the Government and who have direct supervision thereof in the factories that are turning out the supplies. These inspectors and officers are there with their records to give assistance to the local boards that are investigating the matter. The Government, so far as I am informed, up to the present time has had excellent service at the hands of these inspectors. They have been a very efficient class of men. They have frequently rejected supplies that did not come up to the specifications. I want to say now that I think the country owes a debt of gratitude to the manufacturers and producers of the United States for their willingness to turn over to the Government all their facilities to speedily produce the supplies that were necessary for the winning of the war. And the workmen in the factories who gave their best ability toward turning out these supplies deserve the thanks of the country.

There are about four classes of cases that are involved in this legislation. The first class comprises agreements made by the Ordnance Department, which should have been signed by the Chief of the Procurement Division of that department. Instead they were signed by one of his principal assistants. The Comptroller of the Treasury ruled that the signature of this assistant did not comply with the statutory requirements for the execution of valid contracts. This legislation is required so as to enable the Government to settle all cases of this kind.

It often happened that the manufacturer was told that time was the essence of the contract; that he ought to put all his energy into the task of supplying the Government rapidly, because upon the rapidity with which the supplies could be secured would depend the duration of the war. The manufacturers went ahead in good faith to turn out their products as speedily as possible.

Now, when their claims were sent to the comptroller for his approval he called to the attention of the War Department the fact that the contracts on the part of the Government had not been properly executed by the Government and refused to authorize the payment of those claims. Of course later on the War Department corrected anything of that kind. No such contracts or agreements were entered into later than the comptroller's decision, because the War Department realized that the contracts would be invalid, and the contractors could not be paid.

Then there was a second class of cases. The Engineer Department for years had been in the habit of getting merchants to furnish them supplies, especially for river and harbor work, upon blank forms, the validity of which had never been questioned. Those forms were used in the early days of the war by the Engineer Department, and the supplies were furnished the Government. The forms specified consider in detail the character, amount, price, and time of delivery of the required articles. But the comptroller said: "That is invalid; you can not do it," and therefore a large number of cases of that kind are held in suspension.

A third class is that in which the War Department called manufacturers before it and informed them that the Government required a certain article. The manufacturer probably had never turned out that article, but he had certain machinery that could be adapted to the manufacture of that class of goods, and he said frankly to the Government: "I do not know what I can do in the matter of making a price for you. What I will do will be this: I will turn over my factory to the manufacture of this commodity. You put in your official inspectors. We will open our books; we will show you exactly what the cost will be, and then we will agree upon a price." There were no formal contracts entered into, because they could not enter into a formal contract under a condition of that kind.

Then there were, finally, other cases where the Government contemplated taking over large tracts of land for the purpose of manufacturing trinitrotoluol, or TNT, as it is usually called. They went on tracts of farm land and told the men owning it, "We are going to commandeer this land," or "We are going to condemn it, because we need this land for the manufacture of those commodities that will help us to win the war." In many cases the farmers went elsewhere and entered into contracts for the purchase of land many miles away from where they had been formerly. But they were dispossessed. Then the armistice was signed. The Government has not paid these farmers anything for the land. Later the Government found it would not require the land.

Now, those farmers, those men who gladly, in many instances, went off the land in order that the Government might have the proper acreage on which to build factories—and the most notable case is the one at Racine, Wis.—those farmers ought not to be compelled to wait indefinitely for their pay, because they have probably entered into contracts, into agreements for the purchase of new lands, and upon the payment to them of the price of the land taken by the Government depends their ability to pay for the new lands upon which they proposed to settle.

Now, those are the four classes of cases, as nearly as I can recall them.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not know whether it would be possible, but I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks it would be possible to so frame a bill as to validate those contracts which have been erroneously signed, and then put the others in a different class?

Mr. KAHN. That is one thing that the committee did not want to do. They did not want to validate the contracts, because they felt that these claims ought to be settled, and that by failure of the passage of legislation to validate the contracts the probability of a speedy settlement would be more likely to be accomplished.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I further suggest this to the gentleman: Clearly where the contracts have been erroneously signed by some one in the War Department—for illustration, in a case where the other party to the contract has gone on providing material—clearly there is a case where the party ought to be paid, and the contract is there to speak for itself. There are two kinds of contracts that the gentleman has described.

Mr. KAHN. True; but if I can bring it to the gentleman's attention more specifically, I want to say that while the Government itself dealt generally with only one individual, there were numerous subcontractors who obtained contracts from the main contractor, and the main contractor must take upon himself the settlement with his subcontractors. We felt that by refusing to validate those claims the contractor would speedily make his settlement with the subcontractors, and the thing would be wound up without unnecessary delay, whereas in all probability there would be indefinite delay by pursuing the other course.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Then you could have validated those contracts upon certain conditions specified?

Mr. KAHN. Probably in every contract that is involved there is a certain condition that involves just that particular contract. They are not all alike. They have variations. And so, in order to bring the thing to as speedy a conclusion as possible, the bill was agreed to by the committee in the form in which it is presented to the House.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. REED. Is it true that the comptroller has in the past approved and ordered payment upon improperly executed contracts?

Mr. KAHN. Well, I want to say that, so far as my knowledge of the present comptroller is concerned, I do not think that any invalid contract was recommended for payment by him.

Mr. REED. It has been stated on this floor to-day that, following old forms, certain departments had been in the habit of making unlawful contracts and these have been paid. When did this spasm of infallibility and efficiency strike the office of the comptroller?

Mr. KAHN. No; they have not been paid. That is the very reason why this legislation has been asked for, because the comptroller himself refused to pass favorably upon those contracts.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think perhaps what the gentleman from West Virginia has in mind is the fact that one branch of the War Department in peace times——

Mr. REED. The engineering branch?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; the engineering branch had been authorized to make what were called purchase contracts, and when the officers were called upon to make contracts for the department generally they used that form of contract until they were notified that they could not do it.

Mr. REED. By the new comptroller?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; by the comptroller.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Warwick has been in office for some time. Now, what is proposed by this legislation is to give these men who entered into agreements with the Government to turn out supplies for the winning of the war, or to do something that would help to win the war, the same right for the settlement of their claims as those contractors who have duly executed contracts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to have the gentleman's construction of the proposition where a man who really had a bona fide contract which was invalid. If this bill passes, the question of the adjudication of the amount would be left entirely in the hands of the Secretary of War?

Mr. KAHN. The final payment; yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now suppose, as a matter of fact, the Secretary of War was not willing to award to that man an amount which he held was due him; in other words, that the Secretary of War wanted to settle upon a basis which was not satisfactory, and that the facts might tend to prove were not satisfactory and just to the contractors. What remedy would the contractor have?

Mr. KAHN. He would have no remedy whatever. Even if we pass this legislation, he will have no remedy. He can not go into any court of the United States and establish his claim.

Mr. DENISON. His remedy would be to have a bill introduced in his behalf?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; exactly. He could go to the Committee on Claims or the House or the Senate with his claim, but Members are aware how few claims of that kind are ever passed by Congress.

Now, there is a serious condition that confronts many of these men. They have their capital tied up in this work. Many of them have had to borrow from their banks in order to meet the requirements of this Government. They now are paying interest every day, because their banks are carrying them along. I am told that several of these concerns have already gone into bankruptcy and that many others are threatened with bankruptcy. Do you know what that means? It means the closing of many of these concerns before they can adjust their business so as to return to a peace-time basis. It means the throwing out of employment of their mechanics and laborers and forcing them upon the labor market of the country. I do not think the Members of this House want to see such a condition prevail. I imagine that the Members of this House feel that the Government ought to be just as honest as the citizens of the Republic; that every just claim ought to be paid, and that the men who, in the hour of the country's stress, came to the country's assistance should not be penalized because of some informality in the proper execution of their agreements with the Government.

Mr. EMERSON. This bill proceeds upon the theory that the War Department will deal fairly with these contractors. Now, perhaps it will. But should there not be some one—for instance, the President—to whom they could appeal in the event that they thought that they were unfairly dealt with?

Mr. KAHN. The process of dealing with these claims is this: I should state, however, that the War Department officials are dealing with the claims arising under properly executed contracts every day. Before the gentleman was here I stated that the matter is first taken up by a local board composed of officers of the Army who are attached to the particular branch of the military service that negotiated the agreement. In other words, if it be an ordnance matter, ordnance officers pass upon the claim. If it be a quartermaster's matter, officers of the Quartermaster's Department pass upon it. They make a finding. Then later the claim is presented to a second board, which is here in Washington, and is composed of officers in the respective bureaus who are specially selected for this purpose of review. Then the claims are finally sent to the Board of Contract Adjustment in the War Department. They pass upon these claims. They go over the papers. They review the whole matter and finally reach a determination. This is the third board to pass upon the claim. In the process of adjustment it goes through three separate and distinct boards, until it finally gets to the Secretary of War for his approval.

Mr. DENISON. Do these boards have a definite personnel?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Would the gentleman object to putting into the bill an amendment requiring these claims to go in that way?

Mr. KAHN. I certainly would not object, but I am told, or rather the committee were told by the War Department that that is the very course they are now following and that they propose to continue to follow. They propose to continue to follow the same course which they have followed in adjusting all the differences heretofore. I do not think it is really necessary to put that in the proposed legislation, because that is the procedure that has been in vogue at the War Department since we have been in this trouble.

Mr. LEA of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LEA of California. Can the gentleman tell me whether or not the Secretary of War has expressed any intention of so adjusting these claims as to protect the legitimate rights of subcontractors?

Mr. KAHN. Well, I do not know positively what it is their intention to do. I understand that it is the purpose of the War Department, before they make final settlement with the contractor, to see that he makes his settlements with his subcontractors, so as to fully protect them, before the War Department finally will pass upon his claim. I understand that is the department's purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has stated that these agreements should be treated with the same consideration as bona fide written contracts.

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Could any honest contractor object to a requirement being placed in the bill that would provide that the officer who caused the goods to be ordered should make the customary affidavit?

Mr. KAHN. That officer may be dead now.

Mr. BLANTON. But where he is living. I take it that 99 per cent of them are living.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no. In the early stages of the war they were shifted around very rapidly, and many of the officers were sent right over to France to carry on the work there.

Mr. BLANTON. But is there any objection to that where the officer is living and accessible?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think that would meet with the requirements of the Revised Statutes. In fact, we were so told.

Mr. BLANTON. Should not the officer make an affidavit that he had no interest in the contract?

Mr. KAHN. I rather think that ought to be the case, but that is a matter that could be investigated by the men who will be charged with the duty of passing upon these agreements.

Mr. BLANTON. Several of them have been dismissed from the Army and Navy for having an interest in the contracts that they let, have they not?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know whether there were any dismissals. I know that in the Aircraft Board investigation it was brought to light that some of the Army officers had knowledge of what was going to be done and they gave the information to the concerns with which they had previously worked.

Mr. BLANTON. Have there not been courts-martial and convictions?

Mr. KAHN. I doubt whether there have been any convictions or courts-martial. I believe, however there were some indictments.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. As to the suggestion that we should require the officer who made the contract to file an affidavit, he may be dead; he may be inaccessible; it may be practically impossible, and it is not fair to the honest contractors to put the burden on the officer to say that that must be done before the contractor shall be paid.

Mr. KAHN. And, furthermore, the contracts were entered into so rapidly at the beginning of the war, the requirements of the Government were so great, that I doubt whether a single officer who in this way was representing the Government could recall all the facts connected with the making of the contracts or agreements. It would be almost a physical impossibility for him to remember all the details. Take the Members of this House, who get dozens of letters every day, and ask a single one of them what was in a certain letter that he received three or four months ago. Without refreshing his memory from the files of his office, he probably would not remember the incidents referred to in the letter. So it would be almost a physical impossibility for an officer to recall all the conditions surrounding every agreement that was entered into by him on behalf of the War Department.

The Secretary of War has specifically stated to the committee that time is the essence of this thing. Many men who have their money tied up in various manufacturing plants are very anxious to get back to a peace basis. They want to continue the manufacture of those goods or commodities that they were accustomed to manufacture before we got into this war. We should help them in every way possible. We should provide them with the method by which their proper claims can be paid so that they can begin peace-time activities.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. WINSLOW. Does the gentleman think there was any good reason why the contracts could not have been executed concurrently with the execution of the orders themselves?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I stated a little while ago that there was one line of claims where that was absolutely impossible. They were the claims of a concern that was called upon to manufacture a class of goods that had never been manufactured by them at any time. But they had machinery which could be converted to the use of manufacturing that class of goods. The manufacturer would say to the agent of the Government, "I will do this, I will turn over my facilities, but I can not tell what the thing is going to cost the Government because I have to find out what the cost is going to be to me. But I will let you put your inspectors into my factory, I will open the books, and you will have every facility for learning what it is going to cost, and then we will agree on the price and make the written contract."

Mr. WINSLOW. Very good, but could they not make the agreement or contract with that very condition in it?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think they could, because the Revised Statutes are specific upon the subject of making valid contracts and the provisions have to be followed; certain things have to be done, and they could not be done under such a condition of affairs as I have stated.

Mr. WINSLOW. Would the gentleman justify the department in urging manufacturers to begin the manufacture of articles when the Government knew that there was no immediate need for them?

Mr. KAHN. The purchasing department was trying to help win the war and the people of the country were anxious to win the war. The War Department's agents went to the factories. They knew they could not get all the supplies that were needed in many different directions without having the cooperation of many new concerns that they induced to go into the manufacture of war materials for the purpose of turning out the needed quantities of these supplies. They went to the business concerns frankly and stated the Government's case. The manufacturers just as frankly stated their case to the Government. The Government said, "We need the stuff; go ahead." That was done in innumerable cases all through the war. The manufacturer, as a patriotic citizen, relied upon the good faith of his Government that he would ultimately get his pay. And it would be bad faith, in my opinion, on the part of the Government now to refuse to pay these claims for the settlement of which this law is now asked.

Mr. WINSLOW. I can agree to that; but the point I want to get at is whether or not the buying department was clothed with the proper commercial authority when they ordered manufacturers to produce articles when they could get the articles to meet the war necessities through the regular channels.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, every branch of the Navy and War Departments that could enter into contracts authorized the officers of these branches to enter into agreements for the furnishing of the required supplies. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] a while ago stated that anybody could issue orders for the manufacture of goods. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The business of the country is not done quite as loosely as that. The departments had men whose duty it was to negotiate these contracts, and the men so designated were the only ones that could negotiate the contracts. But that is only one line of cases.

Mr. WINSLOW. A very small line.

Mr. KAHN. No; it is a considerable line, and a good deal of money is involved. There is another class of cases sought to be covered by the law. I stated a while ago that farmers in several parts of the country were told to quit their land; that the Government needed the land for erecting factories thereon that were to turn out munitions—turn out supplies that were needed to win the war.

The farmers got off the land. Their claims have not been paid. In some cases before the Government could get control of the entire tract of land that was needed for its purposes the armistice was signed. The farmers were told that the War Department would settle with them. They had no agreements that fixed amounts would be paid. Under the comptroller's decision these men, who in good faith moved upon new land, expecting to pay for that new land out of the funds which they would be paid by the Government, now find themselves high and dry because they can not get their money. It was intended to build a great big T. N. T. plant at Racine, Wis. They required some 2,000 acres at that place. There were two or three other parts of the country where the Government had practically condemned the land. The farmers were ordered off. They were told, at any rate, that no crops would be allowed to be planted during the current year. Those men have legitimate claims against the Government. They ought to be paid their claims. And yet without the passing of this legislation the Government is not in a position to enter into an agreement with these men. What is more, these men have no remedy in any court against the Government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is not my friend in error about that. In the deficiency appropriation bill we appropriated $15,000,000 to pay for lands that the President might requisition and take over and pay for in his discretion. That is the effect of it.

Mr. KAHN. There is no appropriation provided in this bill at all. The President undoubtedly took over those lands, or some of them, but the legal formalities that the comptroller requires were not complied with.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But under the provisions of the deficiency bill none of those requirements was necessary. The President could pay what he pleased.

Mr. KAHN. Under section 120 of the national defense act we thought that we gave the War Department full authority to commandeer every business concern of the country if that were deemed necessary to win the war, if we got into a war. We found out that the language there was not broad enough to cover all of these cases.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. Take, for instance, the land that was taken at Racine from the farmers. That was taken back in July some time.

Mr. KAHN. I do not remember just what the date was. My impression is that it occurred later than July.

Mr. KEARNS. Why has not the War Department made contracts with those farmers long before this time?

Mr. KAHN. I understand they were in process of negotiating at the time the armistice was signed.

Mr. KEARNS. But the armistice was not signed for five or six months after the land was taken. Why have they not made contracts with them?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know why they did not. I am not running the War Department.

Mr. KEARNS. The only question in my mind is why they should come in at this late day and ask for authority?

Mr. KAHN. The armistice was signed on the 11th of November. On the 12th of November the War Department immediately stopped all contracts. The department came to Congress as speedily as possible and asked for authority to pay these claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate under the rule has expired. Under the terms of the rule the bill will be considered under the five-minute rule. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust, pay, or discharge any agreement, express or implied, upon the basis of reasonable value but in no case greater than the agreed price that has been entered into, in good faith during the present emergency and prior to November 12, 1918, by any officer or agent acting under his authority, direction, or instruction, with any person, firm, or corporation for the acquisition of lands, or the use thereof, or for any supplies, material, or equipment to be used in the prosecution of the war, when such agreement has been executed in whole or in part, or expenditures have been made or obligations incurred upon the faith of the same by any such person, firm, or corporation prior to November 12, 1918, and such agreement has not been executed in the manner prescribed by law: Provided, That payment under such agreement shall not exceed the fair value of the property transferred or delivered and accepted by the United States, as determined by the Secretary of War, and where no property has been transferred, delivered, or accepted payment shall not be in excess of the actual cost incurred in preparation for performance, as such cost is determined by said Secretary: Provided further, That this act shall not authorize payment to be made of any claim under such agreements after June 30, 1919: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at the beginning of its next session following June 30, 1919, a detailed statement showing the nature, terms, and conditions of every such agreement and the payment or adjustment thereof: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States upon any agreement of the character herein provided for: And provided further, That no settlement of any claim arising under any such agreement shall bar the United States Government through any of its duly authorized agencies, or any committee of Congress hereafter duly appointed, from the right of review of such settlement, nor the right of recovery of any money paid by the Government to any party under any settlement entered into, or payment made under the provisions of this act, if the Government has been defrauded, and the right of recovery in all such cases shall extend to the executors, administrators, heirs, and assigns, or any party or parties: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any officer or agent of the United States from criminal prosecution under the provisions of any statutes of the United States for any fraud or criminal conduct: And provided further, That this act shall in no way relieve or excuse any officer or his agent from such criminal prosecution because of any irregularity or illegality in the manner of the execution of such agreement: And provided further, That the names of such contractors and the amounts of such partial or final settlements shall be filed with the Clerk of the House for the information of Congress and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or in the Official Bulletin, or as a public document, 10 days before confirmation and payment is authorized upon such contracts.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule which, I believe, provided for consideration of the amendment of the committee, is the committee amendment to be treated as original matter, so that an amendment to it is subject to an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Reading the section of the rule that the amendment reported by the committee shall be read and considered in lieu of the original text, the Chair would feel authorized in construing that to mean that the committee amendment shall be treated as the original text.

Mr. MANN. I think the Chair is right about that, but we ought to have the ruling.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the Chair and to the Members of the House that was the intention of the Committee on Rules in preparing the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will so rule. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, after the word "any," insert the words "foreign government or with any."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Also the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 15, after the word "such," insert the word "Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question about this. Is there any knowledge as to the number of contracts that were entered into with foreign governments?

Mr. DENT. I have no knowledge as to the number.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Alabama will permit, so far as the committee was informed, the agreements with foreign governments were not negotiated in accordance with the procedure set forth in our Revised Statutes, and practically all of the claims of the foreign governments will have to be settled under this provision of law.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman say how much they amount to?

Mr. DENT. I put that in the RECORD yesterday, from a letter written to me by the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell. In one portion of the letter he says:

A recent cable states that the outstanding obligations of the American Expeditionary Forces on November 11 amounted to $1,183,130,000.

The number of them he does not state.

Mr. MANN. What governments were they owing to?

Mr. DENT. The French, the British, and the Italian.

Mr. MANN. Does anyone know what the amounts were?

Mr. DENT. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Of course the War Department knows, but does not give us that information.

Mr. DENT. I have not that definite information.

Mr. MANN. It would be a very easy matter, it seems to me, to divide the total and find out what each Government has owing to it if they wanted to give the information.

Mr. FOSTER. I think Mr. Stettinius was asked about that before the Committee on Rules, and he said he did not know the number of the contracts.

Mr. MANN. How can they reach the amount in dollars and cents without knowing?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know, either.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman, my colleague, knows they can not do it without knowing, and if they know it would be very easy to give the information.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Stettinius had charge of the work over there.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DILLON. Can the gentleman give any information as to the foreign government, whether such foreign government was allowed to represent this Government and at the same time the foreign government represented itself?

Mr. DENT. I really would like the gentleman to restate that question.

Mr. DILLON. I wanted to know if such foreign government could represent its own Government at the same time it represented our Government, so that it occupied a dual position of dealing with both parties?

Mr. DENT. Why, certainly not. Our Government would have its own representative, if that is what the gentleman means.

Mr. DILLON. Well, for instance, suppose that the Government now is binding our Government, could it sell something to this Government——

Mr. DENT. Oh, it can not do that. This simply adds to the bill authority to make settlement with foreign governments as well as contractors in this country.

Mr. DILLON. I have been informed in some instances those foreign governments have represented our Government and at the same time sold government property to our Government, and I wanted to know whether there was any truth in that.

Mr. DENT. I have no information upon it at all.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I read the hearings on that question and they are to this effect, that the foreign government had contracted with their nationals for certain supplies at certain prices, and our Government, our agents, through the foreign government, had their nationals furnish supplies at the same price. That was the form of the negotiation.

Mr. DENT. As I understood the gentleman, he seems to think the foreign government represented itself and our Government at the same time in the transaction.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is nothing in the hearing showing there was anything like that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has raised this question with the gentleman from Alabama, because it affords a better understanding as to why there is confusion in the minds of Members of Congress with regard to these bills. Anyone reading the hearings before the Committee on Rules would assume that the American manufacturers were rushing into bankruptcy because the Government has refused to pay their claims. There was such meager testimony in regard to these oral contracts that some good may have resulted from this discussion in this House. When the gentleman from Kansas asked the Secretary of War how much these claims amounted to in the aggregate, the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, promptly responded that there were as the present, so far as they knew, approximately 6,600 oral contracts, not written contracts, and that the aggregate amount they represented was about $1,600,000,000.

Mr. KAHN. That is in America.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, we find that the gentleman from Alabama answers that of this total amount of $1,600,000,000 Mr. Crowell tells us he knows about $1,183,130,000 goes to foreign governments.

Mr. KAHN. This is the additional amount.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it is additional, then, instead of these oral contracts amounting to $1,600,000,000 they amounted to $2,700,000,000; and yet the taxpayers of the Nation are appealing to the Committee on Ways and Means and the conference committee now in session to cut down the burden that must be levied upon them. Oh, I want these facts brought out. Let us understand the status of the American taxpayers. Granted that we had to do these things suddenly, granted that our agents had to do things in France, Italy, and in England, but also remember the American manufacturer has been suffering from embargoes, and can not to-day obtain shipping space to send his manufacturing material into some of the countries that now assume to control the high seas. We were asked in the Ways and Means Committee only two or three weeks ago to authorize another foreign loan of $1,500,000,000, and we refused to do it. I presume there are some generous souls who think that unpatriotic, even though we have already lent $8,500,000,000. Though we are not going to lend this additional $1,500,000,000 we are going to pay——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think the gentleman stated it exactly correctly when he said we were to lend it. We were to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to lend any part of it, or all of it, to such nations as he might see fit at any time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman states the case correctly, but what I wanted to do was to bring to the attention of my Republican friends and my patriotic Democratic friends, who must answer to the people for the tax burdens we are imposing, that the little bill of $13,000,000,000 which France has presented to Germany for the destruction of property over there, some of which we are paying in this appropriation now, is almost exactly the amount of the deficit in the Treasury of the United States for the year 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is rather amusing to us on this side of the House to hear Republican critics go after this bill. In times gone by it has been the boast of Republican critics—and they were here in the times gone by—that the Republican Party was the party that looked after the business interests of our country, and yet all yesterday and all to-day we hear the criticism of the war horses on the Republican side of this House of the Democratic administration trying to take care of the business interests of this country, and the criticism that is made here is that we have not a sufficient amount of detailed evidence upon which we can base this legislation.

And if the gentleman would take time to look at the hearings before the Military Committee he would find that the greatest Republican that was drafted and brought into the War Department, Maj. Gen. George Goethals, of Panama Canal fame, was the man who came and stood sponsor for this bill and who failed to give the detailed information that a Democrat on this side of the House asked for, and the only criticism that was justified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and his esteemed associates, that he distinguished from the patriotic associates on this side, was criticism that ought to have been thrown at the Republican official who is responsible for this condition having grown up in the Quartermaster's Department while he was there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think I can not, my time has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I have read the hearings and am familiar with them.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has said. In fact, I always like to listen to him. But these agreements that were entered into with foreign Governments were made necessary because Congress itself in the years gone by refused to prepare this country for war. [Applause.] When we got into the war we had not the proper facilities for making heavy guns, for making aeroplanes in quantities, and for doing other things that were essential for engaging in or winning a war. England made them for us, and France made them, and Italy made them. We had to appeal to the Governments that were cooperating with us in this war to furnish us with needed ammunition, with needed guns, with flying machines, with powder and shells—with all those facilities that were required in carrying on the military operations of this Government. And so the Government of the United States got the Governments of England and France and Italy to appeal to their nationals in the various manufacturing lines to furnish our Government with the supplies that we needed over there to help win the war.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Right in that connection I would like to ask if the gentleman from California can tell us how many American guns we shot during the time of the American Army on the other side? I think it is true that there were none at all.

Mr. KAHN. I do not believe it is true. We had some naval guns over there which were used, and we had some hundreds of guns that we had sent from this country.

Mr. MADDEN. Sent them but did not use them?

Mr. FOCHT rose.

Mr. KAHN. Just a moment. I want to repeat my answer to my friend. Of course, the guns that we were sending over—and we were able to send them complete with carriages and all the appurtenances—were beginning to go over in considerable quantity at the time the armistice was signed; but, as a matter of fact, there were fully 500 American guns of various calibers that went over. But that is an object lesson for Congress. You can not make a cannon in a month. It takes six months in ordinary times to turn out a single piece of ordnance. A single cannon in ordinary times is six months in building. We turned them out in this war in as low a period as three months.

Mr. MADDEN. How long were we in the war?

Mr. KAHN. Eighteen months.

Mr. MADDEN. We did not get the cannon out.

Mr. KAHN. Let me tell the gentleman that in order to make a single cannon you have got to make gauges, and jigs, and tools, and dies, that require many months in their manufacture, before the Government can turn out a single cannon.

Mr. MADDEN. We heard many scientific lectures on that question in the House, urging the department to make the jigs and dies and tools and machines, but it is evident that they were asleep on the job.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to my colleague that we gave the Ordnance Department the money to make these gauges and tools and dies, and they never used the money at all. Congress did that before the war. Congress appropriated the money. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Which side of the House did it?

Mr. KAHN. The Republicans and Democrats.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] is recognized.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill under consideration is to confer upon the Secretary of War authority to settle a certain class, or classes, of claims against the Government growing out of informal contracts during the war or out of uncompleted contracts at the time the armistice was signed. During the war the needs of the War Department naturally appealed to the patriotism of the people, and acting through purely patriotic motives and in the belief that the Government would keep faith with the people and meet its moral obligations, the manufacturers and producers, the people generally, who were in position to contribute to the needs of the War Department, did so, and in many instances without waiting for the execution of formal contracts, as required by statute; and it was most advantageous to the Government for them to do so, for in many instances—in fact, in every instance—the necessity for speedy production was so great that the department could ill afford to have production delayed for the completion of formal contracts, which, as a general proposition, would have required considerable time because of the continuous transferring of officials and the many changing conditions incident to the speedy building up of our Military Establishment from what it was when we entered the war to what it was when the armistice was signed. It was therefore patriotic on the part of those furnishing supplies to the Government to push production without awaiting the execution of formal and legal contracts. In fact, their failure to have done so would have subjected them to severe criticism; and, now that they have fulfilled their obligations to the Government, the Government must, in common decency and self-respect, fulfill its obligations to them, which it can not do without additional legislation. Hence the necessity of the passage of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, referring to some of the objections that have been raised to the bill, and especially to the objection of my friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], that the bill confers judicial powers upon the War Department, I will say that the bill is not so designed and will not confer such powers. Its purpose is to remove certain limitations which, under present circumstances, renders the War Department unable to meet its moral obligations over which there are no controversies. There is nothing in the bill to provide for or force the settlement of claims in controversy. There is nothing in the bill to force claimants to accept the terms offered by the Secretary of War when, in their opinion, his terms fail to meet or satisfy the moral obligations of the Government. If such controversies arise and can not be amicably settled by the Secretary of War and the claimant, the latter will have the same remedies at law that now exist. I therefore maintain that the objections of the gentleman from Ohio are not well founded.

The discussion of the merits of the bill was not, however, my object in taking the floor, as it has already been explained in detail by the chairman of the committee and others who have preceded me.

I desire to refer briefly to the reference that was made to the manufacture of guns by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. And in that connection to the criticism, severe and vicious criticism, of the Secretary of War that was made upon the floor on yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? I did not say anything about the manufacture of guns. I said there were no guns on the battle line.

Mr. FIELDS. I accept the gentleman's statement. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] on yesterday delivered a tirade against the Secretary of War, and it seemed that the basis of his complaint was the fact that certain orders for munitions of war had been placed with foreign Governments by the War Department.

Mr. Chairman, I have observed that those who hang their hearts upon and wrap their souls around the great manufacturers and the special interests of the country have groaned in their agonies ever since the War Department placed certain orders with French manufacturers.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I want to finish my statement first. But I will say for the information of the gentleman from Kansas that the Secretary of War explained that transaction fully when he appeared before the Senate committee, after the same criticism had been made of him last year, and showed that the placing of those contracts with the French Government was not an additional burden upon the French Government, as had been charged by some of his critics, but that in a conference between himself and the French and British commissioners it was decided that the placing of such contracts would be in the interest of the prosecution of the war, because France had the factories already equipped and was anxious to secure the orders, whereas it would have required, and did require, several months to equip American factories to do that particular character of work.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If I made myself clear, as I intended to do, what I stated was that Gen. Pershing had to go to foreign contractors because of the failure of the War Department to make contracts early enough with our own manufacturers.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman know of any manufactories in America that were idle during the time that we were engaged in the war? Were they not all operated to their maximum capacity? And since the Secretary of War and the British and French commissioners decided that the placing of these contracts with the French Government was to the best interest of the allied cause, should the gentleman from Kansas now criticize the American Secretary of War for so placing them? I maintain that he can not afford to do so.

It has been intimated that in the manufacture of guns by foreign Governments American manufacturers were not doing anything toward the preparation of these guns. Probably the public generally does not understand that the principal part of the work on 25,750 of these guns was completed by American manufacturers. In other words, they were furnished to the foreign Governments in the shape of forgings. The term "forgings" as applied to a gun would, if applied to a house, mean the completion of the house, all but the paint. The guns were completed in this country on through the forgings, and it was the finishing process which was completed by the foreign Government after the forgings were delivered to them; and the report of the War Department shows, as I have stated, that there were 25,750 of these forgings furnished by American manufacturers.

That should therefore relieve to a considerable extent the agonies of these gentlemen who have been registering such vicious complaints because these orders for guns were placed with French manufacturers.

The gentleman from Kansas alleged, if I heard him correctly, that the War Department had broken down, and that the American Secretary of War had shown his inability to meet the responsibilities imposed upon him, and as proof of his allegation he referred to the fact that dependents or beneficiaries of soldiers are not receiving their allotments, and so forth. I agree with him on that criticism. I believe that the men responsible for those delays should be criticised and even punished. But their failure to disburse allotments promptly does not go to prove that the War Department has broken down or that the American Secretary of War has proven himself inefficient in the prosecution of the war, because those delinquencies, unfortunate and deplorable as they are, are as a drop of rain to the ocean when compared with the achievements of the department since we entered the war.

Mr. Chairman, I have just received from the War Department a report showing its achievements, which I will print for the information of the House and the country, and which is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, this report shows that the American Department of War under the management of Newton D. Baker, whom the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] criticizes and indicts for incompetency, sent more men to France from May, 1917, to November, 1918, than Great Britain sent during the entire four and a third years that she was engaged in the war and moved more tonnage across the seas than was ever moved in a like period, and that in each activity of the department directed to the prosecution of the war it has made the world's greatest record, a record that has never been equaled and that will, in my opinion, never be excelled. Oh, but the gentleman from Kansas said, "What have we got for all this expenditure of money?" Mr. Chairman, I thought that every American citizen, and especially every Member of the American Congress, felt and believed that America had played a potent part in the winning of this war until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Not just now. The gentleman said, "What have we got?"

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I said was that we had less in units of arms and less in units of ammunition and less in munitions of war for the money we spent than any country engaged in this war and that we had spent more money than any country had ever spent in the history of mankind.

Mr. FIELDS. Oh, I will let the gentleman make his speech in his own time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what I said.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, when we entered the war the world recognized the fact that the entente allies were fighting with their backs to the wall, and as a result of our entry into the war we have overthrown the German military machine and got the Kaiser's goat. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], I would also call his attention to the fact that this Government pays its soldiers more than any other country in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. Certainly; and so are labor and transportation charges greater here than in any other country; in fact, every commodity, everything, is higher here than anywhere else in the world, and in view of that fact and the unparalleled achievements of the Secretary of War and the department of which he is the head, it ill becomes the gentleman from Kansas to rush to the floor of this House, after the victory we have won, and try to create the impression throughout the country and the world that the Government of which he is a part has not been a potent factor in the winning of this war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it is obviously impossible to discuss this bill from all the angles that have been suggested in this debate in a simple five minutes, and one must be content therefore to take up only one or two phases of the subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman discuss the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is what I will do if I get the time.

Mr. MADDEN. And the importance of passing these claims, and omit discussing how the war was fought.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is exactly what I had in mind to do. It is not a question of reviewing the conduct of the War Department in this war, but the question of the Government of the United States paying its just and lawful debts, whether anybody has a legalized scrap of memoranda of them or not.

Now, that is the view and intent of the committee, notwithstanding the necessary policy of the War Department in making tentative contracts, either orally or in the shape of memoranda in one form or another, in order that the work might commence immediately, and without waiting for some decision or the completion of some convenient detail, for a formal contract to be signed. We have sought to take into account all those conditions and perplexities attending the last few contracts that did not happen to be formally completed in writing as required by law when the clock struck 12 on this armistice.

For a year and six months and more we have gone on allowing the War Department to do these various things. Sometimes it started out with nothing but a telephone message over the wire directing somebody to go ahead and begin operations, saying the papers would follow. This would be done by the contractor, and finally the formal contract required by the statute would come along and be signed. These contractors have gone on with the work, and in the course of time the formal contract has been forwarded to them and signed and returned and filed, and the Comptroller of the Treasury has allowed payment. That same process has gone on over and again in thousands and thousands of cases all through the year and seven months. Then all at once the great warp and woof of these enormous activities has been cut, because the clock struck at midnight on a certain day, the edge where the cutting took place becomes a selvage, and those people who are left on that selvage are suddenly suspected by some gentlemen as somehow being possible parties to a possible fraud, simply because their edge is not like the complete pattern that runs up to it. I can not understand why that should be.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I should be glad to yield, but I have not the time. The gentleman is experienced on the floor, and knows how difficult it is to make a statement like this in five minutes.

I can not understand why we should undertake to hold up the payment on these last transactions and still permit the long succession of similar processes to stand because they had come to completion and to the formal signing of statutory contracts. I do not see why we should hold up the last ones and allow the others to pass unchallenged. I do not see why any man should be put to any greater burden in this matter than the others, so long as he has rendered his service and given what was contracted for to the Government.

Neither can I understand another phase of it, which comes about in the practical operation of this thing. I have a case in mind which does not involve a great trust or one of these great munition monopolies that people seem to be so afraid of. It involves a typical case that probably is duplicated all up and down the land, where people owning a machine shop, comparatively small and unpretentious as modern industrial plants go, the capital stock probably not amounting to more than $100,000, found that their machinery was adaptable to the making of shrapnel shell and went to work on it at the instance of the Government. They performed several contracts for the Government, all of which went through these stages of development, from the first verbal instructions to the final completion of the papers according to the statute, and the payment of the money by the Treasury. They did that several times, and then, just a few weeks before the armistice, they got the usual informal telegram or telephone message, "Go ahead and make us some more of these things." Being good patriots they took the Government at its word. They trusted to the good faith of the United States of America and went on and started another order, got their raw materials, engaged their workmen in the various processes, and bought or used $50,000 or $60,000 worth of material which will be spoiled if the work is not completed. At a certain time on a certain day, let us say, because of the armistice, everything was stopped, leaving them just short by a few days of having a formal written contract. Therefore, there is now no authority of law to pay these men. If we hold payment up by any commission or board, or reference to any long-drawn-out process of that kind, you and I know what will happen. The concerns like this one that have got $50,000 or $60,000 worth of money tied up in raw materials and labor will simply be wiped out of existence by the delay. They can not finance themselves in such a delay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We know what will happen. Those people will simply be wiped out of existence. And their case is duplicated all up and down this land from one end of it to the other, where patriotic men were able to turn some little plant of one kind or another over to the service of the Government and were patriotic enough not to require the Government to give a bond to pay the bill before they went ahead to help the Government to fight the enemy in a war.

Now, here is another phase of this matter: We understand from a statement from Mr. Dorr, of the War Department, which has been put into the report, that certain of these transactions, having been made formal contracts and reduced to writing, and, as it was supposed, having been completed in accordance with law, turn out upon second inspection to be missing in some technical detail or to be wrong in some technical detail. Nobody at the time suspected that there was any disagreement as to the terms, nor is there now. Nobody had any thought about the matter until the comptroller, whose business it is to see if he can find flies on barn doors, has found a fly on this barn door. He has found that some contract does not literally comply with the statute, although it was meant to comply with it in honest intention. So he says, "I can not by authority of law pay you any money on that contract until it is amended."

Mr. HASTINGS. Give us some illustrations of that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There are illustrations in these purchase orders of the Engineer Corps, and also in the Ordnance Department, where the wrong man signed the papers.

There is another phase of this thing which to my mind is a great deal more significant, perhaps, than any of the others. It is claimed by our friends who object to this that somehow by this statute we are going to invest the War Department with judicial powers, that we are going to erect in the War Department a court, and curiously enough we are going to allow one party in the contest to be the judge of the case. That is not true. That is a misunderstanding and a misapprehension of the facts. If you will look at formal contracts that were completed you will find that the Secretary of War reserved the right of cancellation at any stage of the fulfillment, and if he had—as he did in instances—invoked his right to cancel the contract before the term of it had been completed, then there would have been left for the War Department to adjudicate precisely the same condition of affairs that arises under these other contracts that were not reduced to writing, contracts that had been suddenly stopped by the armistice.

Under formal contracts men had begun to go into the process of manufacturing; they had purchased raw material; they had engaged labor and begun to expend money, when all at once the Secretary of War invoked the right of cancellation. What happened? There were certain damages that had to be ascertained, there were uncertain damages that had to be determined. Parties had to get together, as between the contractor and the War Department, and arrive at the damages under the contract. That has been going on through a year and six months, through the machinery of the War Department, and we have not complained.

Now this bill proposes to take care of these cases of informal contracts just the same as was done by reason of the cancellation clause written into the formal contracts.

We have cases now where contracts have not got to the written stage, but where the cancellation clause may be said to be injected into them just the same by the effect of the armistice. The Secretary of War wants to do the same thing by these honest men that he did with other honest men who had their contracts in writing. But people are suspicious and say it is making him a court. It is not making him a court now any more than in the other case.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was it not expected by everybody that these contracts would be carried out by both parties in good faith, and was it not only the position taken by the comptroller that has brought about this situation?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Absolutely. On the morning of the day that the armistice was signed the War Department and these contractors were going ahead with the utmost good faith; the patriotic manufacturer was doing the work and trusting in the good faith of the Government, and the Government relied upon the patriotism of the manufacturer to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. So that on this morning when this business was going along in absolute good faith between the contractor and the department, nobody had the faintest idea that a to-morrow was going to see any change in the relations between the parties. And there never has been any change between the parties. Nor has the contractor and the War Department come to any disagreement about these contracts. Time was the essence in the case, and the haste occasioned by it brought about the failure to start with formal contracts. And so time, unfortunately, swinging back on the return beat of the pendulum, has been the cause of failure of payment, because the clock struck on a certain day before the agreements had been put into writing.

If we are to go in now on the theory that, because the War Department has done something technically wrong in working in great haste under pressure of war, so men who are honestly creditors of the Government to-day shall be penalized for the department's omission by withholding their pay, what sense of justice will the people of the United States think there is in the proposition? These men are not responsible.

I do not doubt that the War Department has been guilty of errors in the conduct of these war preparations, and I have no doubt that some of the contracts that have been made have been used as a means by which unscrupulous men have imposed upon the good faith of the Government. I do not doubt that some bad contracts were made, filled, and settled by payment in the course of this year and a half of unparalleled war emergency. Perhaps some bad contracts are actually on the way to settlement now. But I think it is still fair and reasonable to believe that the most of these contractors were honest, as I presume 90 per cent of our whole American society is, and we might wisely apply the spirit of the well-known proposition of Blackstone by saying that we can well afford to pay 10 dishonest men so that the 90 per cent of honest men will be done no wrong but will get what is due them. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER rose.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to cut off debate, but I hope the gentleman will let me pass these other committee amendments.

Mr. TOWNER. I shall only take five minutes and perhaps not that. Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct what perhaps may be a wrong impression which the committee may have received from some remarks by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL]. The gentleman from New York gave the impression, I am quite sure, that he himself was strongly in favor of this bill. I was surprised in reading the hearings, because I read this on page 7 of the hearings before the committee. Mr. CALDWELL, the gentleman from New York, was interrogating Gen. Goethals, and this was the question he asked, or rather the statement that he made:

> Mr. CALDWELL. Here is the proposition: A law was on the statute books stating that these contracts should be made in such and such a way. This being a country of laws, it was expected that the men who hold executive office would comply with the laws passed by the Congress of the United States. Yet, in utter disregard of the law they continued to make these agreements or contracts which are not legal, and now they are asking Congress to say that what they, God's annointed, did shall be paid for with the people's money.

And then the gentleman from New York, doubtless with great emphasis, added:

> And I will not vote for such a proposition as that.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the second proposition that I was surprised to ascertain from these hearings was this: I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] to say to the committee that Gen. Goethals was very strongly in favor of the propositions contained in this bill, and immediately following Mr. CALDWELL'S statement I read the following from the hearings:

> Gen. GOETHALS. That is all right. We are just telling you the conditions, and it is up to you to pass the bill or not, as you see fit. I am perfectly willing to tell the contractors that they have their recourse to the Court of Claims.

So it would hardly be proper or fair to Gen. Goethals to say that he himself was in favor of this method of settling these claims. He himself declares that he would be perfectly satisfied if these gentlemen had their recourse in the Court of Claims.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I see the gentleman from New York about to rise, and I should be very glad to yield to him if he so desires. [Laughter.] I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CALDWELL. I gladly give way to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to refer the gentleman to page 31 of the hearings, where the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], in interrogating the comptroller, said:

Why would it not be the best plan to give the Court of Claims authority over these cases?

And I would like the gentleman to refer to page 34 of the same hearings, in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is made to say:

Would there be any provision under this bill by which anyone could restrain the Secretary of War? Do you not say in this bill the allowance made by the Secretary of War shall be final and conclusive? Neither you nor I nor anybody else expects the Secretary of War himself to pass on these things.

Then, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to quote the gentleman from New York still further. Interrogating the comptroller he said:

When these contracts were made there was talk in the Halls of Congress and on the streets of our country to the effect that men formerly employed by these great contractors were the people who were giving the contractors all the contracts. Under this bill those men will be put on boards to pass on the question as to what their former bosses are going to get when the war is over. After we have won there is no need of paying tribute for winning the war.

[Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's interrogatory, I will say that he himself has stated all that is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think I ought to be entitled to five minutes now.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman just talked.

Mr. CALDWELL. I know; but the gentleman must understand that I am both a Democrat and a Republican.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman is either. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. And now they have jumped on me as a Republican. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, the Chair thinks, is entitled to be recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. The Chair is always fair, and I would like to be recognized after the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will frankly admit that the bill that was presented to us by Gen. Goethals was so far objectionable that I could not support it, but if the Committee of the Whole will look at the bill it will see that every word of the original bill has been stricken out, and the Military Committee has in effect proposed a new bill which carries checks and balances that relieve it of the trouble that was presented by the Republican, Goethals. Notwithstanding the fact that the record shows that Gen. Goethals said he was willing to send the matter to the Court of Claims, the accent of his voice was such as to indicate that he felt that it would be a shame to do so. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was not there, and I was, and I will leave it to the Republican members of the Committee on Military Affairs if I have not properly interpreted the remarks.

Mr. KAHN. The chairman of the committee introduced the bill and he was requested to do so by the Democratic Secretary of War.

Mr. CALDWELL. And he sent the Republican, Goethals, down there to follow it up.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He was the only able one they had.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Illinois uses his time, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of his remarks all debate upon this amendment be concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending amendment be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was very much gratified to learn from the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] that the Committee on Military Affairs had sense enough to provide checks and balances with which to pay these bills. [Laughter.] Of course, you could not provide the checks unless you had the balances, and now I am surprised to find that this very same committee, with all these wise men aboard, are coming before the House requiring the Treasury of the United States to furnish the balances, while they are providing the checks. Seriously, however, the Government of the United States was compelled to enter into the contracts, and whether it entered into contracts with France or England or Italy or with American citizens or corporations makes no difference. We were engaged in a great struggle. We tried to do the best we could. We were being urged to win the war, to speed up, and it took some urging on the part of Congress sometimes to force the executive branches of the Government to speed up; but when they finally did awaken to the importance of the situation they got busy. Whether it was necessary to make a written contract, or a telegraphic contract, or a verbal contract, or a telephonic contract makes no difference. The object was to get results, and it would not make any difference if you continued the war for the next 10 years. When the war was over the same condition would obtain that applies now. Unfinished contracts would be in existence, claims for damages would be justified, factories that were turned over to the Government would be where they had to be converted to civil use. These factories during the process of conversion to civil use will be idle, and claims, and proper claims, must be made against the Government. Supplies that have already been furnished by contractors not now needed are on hand ready for sale to somebody who will buy them, and they ought to be paid for. Whether the contract was completed or only begun, the measure of damages must be ascertained. The Government of the United States can not afford to be less than just, and it will be just.

No man should receive a dollar that is not due him. Every man should receive every dollar due him. [Applause.] The United States Government has its reputation at stake. It can not afford as a Government to do what an individual would not be permitted to do, and we, as the representatives of the American people, can not afford to say that any man living within the confines of America patriotic enough to turn everything over to the Government to win the war must now be considered as an outcast and unworthy of confidence. We can not afford to say here that the Secretary of War, who had power to adjust a contract legally made, must not have the power to adjust a contract, whether legally made or not, if it was made in good faith. The time has come when somebody must be trusted. These adjustments must be made. Losses on the part of American citizens can not be tolerated by the Congress or by the Government.

We can not afford to take the chances of creating panic, and whether the claims amount to $1,600,000,000 for American citizens and European governments, or $1,100,000,000 more for European governments, or whether those two figures measure the amount of responsibility, or whether the responsibility is twice as great, yet if there is a legal claim against the Government it must be met, and it ought to be met in all fairness as promptly as possible, trusting somebody to do the thing that should be done, assuming that the Government functionaries, whether they be the Secretary of War or the President of the United States, or whomsoever may be charged with this responsibility, will do his duty as he understands it. He should ascertain the facts, report upon the conditions as they are found to be, and pay the balance due to whoever it may be found to be due without any undue delay, and if in the consideration of the settlement of this question any person is found to have done wrong we have our remedy in the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the committee all debate is closed on this amendment, and the question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following additional committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as an additional proviso: On page 5, line 10, at the end of the bill, add the following:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize payment to be made upon any agreement of a character other than referred to unless the agreement or some memorandum thereof was at the time reduced to writing by an authorized officer or agent of the Government."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know but what that amendment might embarrass the department in the settlement of these contracts. This is a committee amendment which was agreed to in the committee, and it was agreed to because the Secretary of War stated before the Committee on Rules emphatically that practically all of these contracts had been reduced to some sort of written form in the War Department, and it was on such written memoranda that they expected to settle those contracts, and it is for that reason that the amendment is offered.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. MANN. Many of these contracts, so called, were entered into, and orders were made by telegraph, possibly by mail and by long-distance telephone. Of course, the person furnishing the material had no knowledge and could have no knowledge as to whether the officer who telegraphed him or wrote him or telephoned him sat down and made a written memorandum of what he had done. Now, this is a bill by which you select one man out and pay him and on the same terms, as far as another contractor is concerned, you do not pay him.

Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois; but the information that the Rules Committee had was to the effect that every one of these telegraphic and telephonic orders had been put in some sort of a written form by the officer who dealt with the transaction, and that is the reason——

Mr. MANN. Well, a copy of the telegram would not be a written memorandum, and a letter itself would not be a written memorandum.

Mr. DENT. A copy of the telegram would not be a written memorandum?

Mr. MANN. Certainly not.

Mr. DENT. It depends on whether it is broad enough.

Mr. FOSTER. I think what the War Department claims is that where they gave a telegraphic order it was based on previous memorandum made by War Department officials.

Mr. MANN. There were may cases throughout the country where officials of the War Department went to cities, went to factories, and themselves personally gave orders which had been under consideration. They could have no written memorandum made at the time.

Mr. FOSTER. They stated it was within the War Department now—all of these—and that all of these were based on that sort of a memorandum.

Mr. MANN. There is so much inefficiency in the War Department I doubt very much whether they have half of such cases with proper memoranda.

Mr. DENT. As I said at the beginning, I rather question whether or not the committee was wise in offering this amendment now, upon reflection, but it was offered in the committee and adopted by the committee upon the statement that there was a written memorandum of every contract, and they propose to settle on these memoranda.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. If this amendment was adopted and there was one case where that sort of a memorandum may not have been made, then it can not be paid?

Mr. DENT. That is true, and that is the reason why I am inclined to think perhaps——

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I do.

Mr. McKENZIE. Was it not stated before our committee that there were no such cases where there was not a memorandum of some character in the War Department?

Mr. DENT. That is true.

Mr. McKENZIE. And it seems to me it would be a most violent presumption for the Congress of the United States to assume that some man should after the armistice had been signed come out and say, "Well, I had some certain form of contract with the War Department," and not a single memorandum of any character there. While this legislation may be considered of doubtful wisdom, judging from such speeches we have heard here to-day, surely this amendment would not make it more doubtful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks that his time be extended for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman have any apprehension that the use of the word "memorandum" here will put it in the class of construction that the word bears in connection with the statute of frauds? Does not the gentleman think that possibly the use of the word "record" would be better than the word "memorandum"? That is, the word "record" would be much less formal, I think.

Mr. DENT. I see the gentleman's point. There might be something in that.

Mr. ELSTON. After this becomes a law, of course, the word "memorandum" would be susceptible of the very strict construction it has in connection with the statute of frauds.

Mr. DENT. I do not think so, in view of the fact that the amendment as originally offered by a member of the committee contained the language of the statute of frauds, and if I may, without violating the rules of the House, I will say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] moved to amend so as not to make this apply.

Mr. ELSTON. If the gentleman will permit a moment, that, of course, would not be a part of the statute and would not be read with it. I think the use of the word "record" there would cover most any kind of a memorandum in connection with the contracts.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is not the purpose of this amendment to do what the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] seeks to avoid? Is it not the purpose to have this come within the requirements of the statute of frauds, and so to shut out all claims of speculative profits?

Mr. ELSTON. I had reference to the matter of time.

Mr. DENT. No; it is not the purpose.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I was in hopes that it was.

Mr. DENT. It is not the purpose of this amendment to make the contract come within the provision of the statute of frauds. If it did, that would destroy the purpose of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama may be read once more. There is confusion here as to just what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, that amendment, should it be made law and be enforced, would work a great hardship to some innocent people, for it would absolutely deprive them of any opportunity to have their claims settled. I can make this plain by presenting some of the principal facts of a case in which a number of my constituents are interested. These facts were told me at my home in Racine on November 19 last by three farmers, whose farms were all located a few miles north of Racine. These men said that in September last—about the middle of the month, I believe—a man representing himself to be an agent of the United States Government came to their homes and endeavored to secure 30-day options on their farms, at the same time saying that the Government was going to buy 2,000 acres there of contiguous land, with a view to establishing a great T. N. T. plant. The farmers who called on me had some of the option blanks which the agent had left with them. These were not printed at all, being merely typewritten carbon copies, from which the words "the United States Government" or "the Government of the United States," customary in blanks used by or for the Government, were omitted. Blank spaces were left for these words. The agent went from farmer to farmer and said, "We want your land for the purposes of a T. N. T. plant. We want you to sign this option. Of course, it is really immaterial to us whether you sign or not, for in any event the Government of the United States will take your land."

These farmers told me that when they asked for evidence of his authority to act for the Government he pulled something out of his pocket and read it without showing it to them. They took it for granted that he had the authority. And I believe that he had. Although the blanks contained the customary statement, "In consideration of $1 in hand paid," they told me also that none of them had ever received one cent of the dollar which those who signed options had receipted for.

Before the 30-day options had expired men claiming to be agents of the Government took 2,000 acres of contiguous land, land on which options had been given and land on which options had not been given, and put up all over it signs bearing the words "Property of the United States Government"

The men who called on me had given no options. They said to the agent, "When are we going to get our money?" The reply was, "You will get it very soon. The Government will settle up with you." Thereupon all the farmers on the 2,000 acres moved away with their families. Some of them took options on homes in the city of Racine, and others on farm lands elsewhere.

They received nothing, as I have said, for their farms. This left some of them without means to pay for the property on which they themselves had taken options. Winter was coming on, and there they were.

Most, if not all, of this land was taken about the middle of October, when everybody knew that the Germans were defeated.

Now, we want these men to be paid. Their property was trenched—dug up; railroad tracks were put down; buildings were erected; and all without paying even one penny to any of the owners of the farms thus seized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Has the gentleman any doubt in his mind as to the authority of these men who came along and made those contracts? It seems to me it is a very dubious proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, it looked dubious to me, Mr. Chairman, until I went up to the War Department and was informed that these agents had acted with the authority of the Government. In the office of the Assistant Secretary of War I dictated to a stenographer a statement of the facts of the Racine case. Two or three days later—I think the next day—some one, I do not know who, telephoned me from the War Department saying that the Racine case was one of great merit, and that it would receive prompt attention.

On November 19, after these farmers called on me, I telegraphed a statement of the facts to the Secretary of War and asked what the department was going to do about the matter. On December 6 I received a letter from the Assistant Secretary of War in reply to my telegram, in which he says:

The situation which you mention seems to require immediate attention. I have therefore caused a special investigation to be instituted in this matter, and it will be expedited as rapidly as possible.

Yours, very truly,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
Assistant Secretary.

Over to the left and near the signature were the initials "C. W. H." I do not know who he is.

Now, as I say, those farmers ought to be paid. Some of the property is practically destroyed for agricultural purposes. They are bound by contracts into which they subsequently entered for the purchase of other real estate. They are subject to a very great hardship. The question is, Mr. Chairman, whether this bill, which would authorize the Secretary of War to settle and adjust these cases, would allow the Secretary of War to appoint for the adjustment of these claims or other claims arising out of similar circumstances any of the men who authorized or conducted the negotiations or work on behalf of the Government. The farmers and other honest claimants ought to be paid promptly and in full. We ought to insist on knowing all about why there was such haste in attempting to establish a great T. N. T. plant to cover 2,000 acres during the very closing days of the war, when we knew that the German armies had met with overwhelming defeat.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman think these people ought to be paid for the land and keep it, too?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but I think they ought to be paid for the land, those who gave options and those who did not give options, the Government having taken over the property of all.

Mr. GORDON. Do you claim that would not be exercised under this authority if the bill is adopted?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is no memorandum nor option in some cases. They took the land of some men who had given no option. And if this amendment should be adopted, then in cases where there is no memorandum or option the farmer could not have his claim settled.

Mr. GORDON. There is an implied contract on the part of the Government if it took it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But does not the gentleman from Ohio see that there is no written memorandum?

Mr. GORDON. But there is an implied contract by the very act of the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But this provision that I have read specifically provides that there shall be a memorandum, or otherwise there can be no adjustment or payment of the claim. There would have to be a suit.

Mr. GORDON. But this does not preclude payment by the Government for stuff that it has actually taken. Those claims are not covered by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In view of what has been said by gentlemen, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if the contention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] is correct. Under the amendment now pending, which would specifically prohibit the payment of any claim for which there is not a memorandum, if a man's property has been taken without any option, there being no written agreement signed by him at all nor by the Government, would he get any pay?

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that if this amendment is adopted it is my construction of it that unless the officer or the agent of the Government who handled the transaction did file some written memorandum as to the transaction, he could not get payment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is as I understand it, and in the absence of anything of that kind these farmers in my district whose property was taken without their having signed an option and without there being any written agreement by the Government to take their property or any memorandum made at that time would be absolutely barred.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Without that agreement they would not fall within the class provided for by this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think they would.

Mr. GOOD. It applies to those between whom there is an agreement of some kind with the Government—between the Government and the claimant.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman is mistaken. If he will look at line 17 he will see the language, "and such agreement has not been executed in the manner prescribed by law." That language covers implied contracts. Moreover, in line 4, page 3, the bill specifically mentions agreements "express or implied."

Mr. GOOD. But there was no meeting of the minds in those instances.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he does not understand it to be the law that where the Government of the United States takes property under its power to commandeer—takes possession of any property, either real or personal—it is bound to pay the fair valuation of that property, regardless of whether there is a contract or not?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is very true.

Mr. FIELDS. They did not resort to commandeering proceedings there.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Very true; but if Congress should pass a law providing that no claim of that kind shall be adjusted, paid, or discharged unless there is a memorandum, then the law which the gentleman has just cited would not control. The last law passed by Congess would govern that transaction, and these farmers could not have their claims adjusted or paid through negotiation or mutual agreement. They would have to litigate.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter which I wrote on the subject of this T. N. T. plant at Racine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 6, 1918.

Mr. VINCENT NOVAK,
Box 85, R. F. D. 1, Racine, Wis.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the subject of the proposed T. N. T. plant, North Racine, about which we had a conversation, I have to inform you that a letter from the War Department addressed to me at Racine was forwarded and received here. The letter is dated November 25, but did not reach me until yesterday. This is the first word in reply to my telegram to the War Department, sent November 19, that I have received.

After some preliminaries the letter, which is signed by the Assistant Secretary of War, concludes as follows:

"The situation which you mention in your telegram seems to require immediate attention. I have therefore caused a special investigation to be instituted in this matter and it will be expedited as rapidly as possible.

"Yours, very truly,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
"Assistant Secretary of War."

The letter also contains the statement that the department is making every effort to determine as soon as possible all the questions involved in each of the problems which have arisen out of the sudden cessation of hostilities, and that upon the determination of such questions in each case where the department has caused damage every lawful step toward making prompt reparation will be made. The Assistant Secretary says also that some of the cases are more urgent than others by reason of the hardships which may result from delay, and then says that he will take up the Racine case at once.

I will call at the War Department this afternoon or to-morrow morning and do everything that I can to have the difficulties with the property owners properly settled.

Yours, very truly, HENRY ALLEN COOPER.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin the fact that the very case he refers to was brought before the committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] asked Mr. Dorr, who represented the War Department upon this particular matter, to give a specific case that would be affected by this law, a case that they sought to remedy under this law, and his reply was:

Mr. DORR. I might mention one which was brought to my attention this morning. That was the case where the Government was planning to build a T. N. T. plant at Racine, Wis. At the time the armistice was signed it became evident that that plant ought not to be proceeded with. The plant was just beginning, and it had been necessary to get some land for it, and that land had been occupied; options had been given; there was a question of titles to look up; and the whole matter could not wait for the adjustment of the technicalities of the real estate law in the matter, and the Government was occupying the land. There were farmers who had their all in their little places and had turned over the occupancy of that land to the Government, and the Government naturally wants to make some compensation to the owners, to give them relief, and I do not see how we are going to do it. There was a very urgent telegram from that locality urging the department to make prompt settlement in the matter. I do not see how that can be done without enabling legislation.

He asked this law for the express purpose of taking care of this case and others like it, and this bill is drawn to enable the War Department to take care of it, and his statement is that options and memoranda had been given which will enable them to do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman will observe that in that statement the witness declares that options had been given.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But options were not given in some cases, but the property was taken.

Mr. GORDON. There is an implied contract to pay for it, then.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly; but if you abrogate the implied contract by a specific statute which says you shall not pay on the implied contract, that you shall not pay unless there is a written memorandum of agreement, that repeals it pro tanto, of course.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the general statement was made to the committee that there was no case where a memorandum did not exist. Therefore we propose this amendment to the bill. Furthermore, in this particular case Mr. Dorr stated that options had been given, and that these men did have memoranda showing the contract and the amount the Government was to pay. Of course, if that is not true, then it does not come within this amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the farmers who called on me on the 19th of November last, intelligent, educated men, were positive in declaring that they had not given options, and had nevertheless been compelled to move off of their property. They knew better about the facts than did the witness just quoted by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the case cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] of these men who refused to give an option is a case where there was no contract and no pretense of a contract, of course; but if the Government took possession of their land, by operation of law an obligation was created for the Government to pay the reasonable value of that land.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. These men did not refuse. They were handed this document to read over, and before they consented or made up their minds what to do the property was taken.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, well, then, that does not alter the facts at all. If the Government takes property, which the Government can only lawfully do in time of war, that creates an obligation on the part of the Government to pay the reasonable value of that property.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. Of course I suppose it is generally conceded that if the Government takes the property of a citizen, the citizen has a right to go into court, vindicate his rights, and receive payment?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly. He could sue in the Court of Claims on that very thing.

Mr. VENABLE. But do you contend he could do it under this bill?

Mr. GORDON. No; not under this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. He would not be limited to the Court of Claims. He could go into the Federal court of his locality.

Mr. VENABLE. However, if this amendment is adopted, will it not be a prohibition upon the Secretary of War to prevent his paying any claim, however meritorious, unless there was some sufficient memorandum in writing?

Mr. GORDON. Not if the goods have been delivered; certainly not; and this statute is not intended to cover those cases at all.

Mr. VENABLE. When it specifically states that no claims shall be paid unless there was a memorandum?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly. The purpose of this legislation is to provide for the adjudication of contracts not executed. Now, in the case cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] the contracts were executed and possession of the property was taken. In two instances no agreement had been entered into, but the Government seized the property, anyway, and thereby, by operation of law, there arose an obligation upon the part of the Government to pay the reasonable value of that property.

Mr. VENABLE. Is there anything in the bill which confines it to contracts that are not executed? Regardless of what you construe the intent to be, does it not prescribe a number of informal claims that were bad because they did not come up to the statutory requirement as to form?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; but the cases which the gentleman refers to do not come within this statute.

Mr. VENABLE. And then you say that none of these contracts shall be satisfied and the moral obligation discharged unless there is a sufficient memorandum.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; sufficient to determine the contract.

Mr. VENABLE. Would not the court construe that as prohibiting the payment by the Government in the case mentioned by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly not; and I will tell you why.

Mr. VENABLE. I wish to understand why.

Mr. GORDON. These men to whom the gentleman from Wisconsin referred as not having given an option upon their land, but whose land was seized by the Government, can present a claim for the value of that land to the War Department. If the War Department refuses to pay it or they are unable to agree upon a price, they can commence a suit in the Court of Claims against the United States for the recovery of it. Not a single one of the claims covered by this bill can be sued for in the Court of Claims without express authority of Congress.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose the Government took possession of the business, or took possession of the land, and holds it a week or a day through the commandeering process, does the gentleman claim that the Government has got to buy the land or pay for the use?

Mr. GORDON. Of course, the Government has got to make some just settlement in the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the rule:

When general debate is closed by order of the House, any Member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the Member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. I think it will not be objected to by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the proposed amendment the words "at the time," and insert the words "on or before November 12, 1918."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up much time in the discussion of this proposed amendment. The term "at the time" is exceedingly indefinite. Certainly none of the quasi contracts were entered into after the 12th of November. The armistice took effect at midnight, the 11th of November, 1918. In order to give them sufficient latitude to get in, if you adopt the amendment you ought to allow the memorandum to be made during the period up to the 12th of November, 1918, and remove all discussion that will arise over what "at the time" means. Does that mean some hour, some day, or some week? "At the time" is indefinite.

Now, there is one other matter I wish to allude to. It seems to be advocated here—and I was at first impressed with it—that where the Government took possession of property, as related by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and received property, that that was provided for under the general law, and the Government had it to pay for, regardless of this act. But this act undertakes to deal with that very condition, because you find in the proviso, line 18, the following:

Provided, That payment under such agreement shall not exceed the fair value of the property transferred or delivered and accepted by the United States, as determined by the Secretary of War, and where no property has been transferred, delivered, or accepted payment shall not be in excess of the actual cost incurred in preparation for performance, as such cost is determined by said Secretary.

That brings the case cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin within the control of this act. I am inclined to think that the whole amendment is vicious, and if it is adopted it ought to be adopted with the provision fixing an absolute date on which the memorandum was filed.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be concluded in 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Debate on what?

Mr. DENT. On the committee amendment and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment proposed by him and all amendments to that amendment be concluded in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ELSTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he expects to continue the session until this bill is disposed of?

Mr. DENT. I certainly do. This is the last committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, if 30 minutes' time is allowed and members of the committee seeks recognition in favor of the amendment, will they first be entitled to recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House, as the gentleman knows, each member of the committee is entitled to preferential recognition. The Chair does not think that when a member of the committee has spoken once that he is entitled to preferential recognition again.

Mr. MANN. That is true, with the modification that first a member of the committee in favor of the amendment is entitled to recognition and then one who is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. I am a member of the committee and have been trying to get recognition for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kentucky once. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" "Vote!"] The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, after the word "contracts," strike out the period and insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided further, That no payment shall be made on any claim made under this act until affidavit has been made by the officer or agent, if living, who, on behalf of the War Department, made the agreement or arrangement upon which said claim is based, that it was entered into or made without any benefit or advantage to himself, and that he is not interested, directly or indirectly, in whatever may be paid thereon."

Mr. DENT. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina has already been adopted.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I was under a misapprehension and I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama as amended by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DENT) there were 50 ayes and 67 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to come at the end of the bill, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"And provided further, That all authority heretofore authorizing the Secretary of War to acquire real estate, by purchase or otherwise, by any act or acts of Congress providing for the existing emergency is hereby repealed, and that any unfinished contracts for the acquiring of real estate are hereby canceled, and that hereafter the Secretary of War or his agents shall not be permitted to acquire title to any real estate, by purchase or otherwise, until specifically authorized so to do by act of Congress and the providing of an appropriation by Congress to pay for the same when such purchase is duly authorized."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up the time of the committee to discuss this amendment at any length. I think you all understand the purpose of it. The purpose is to prevent the War Department from purchasing any more real estate. Under the war power and under the law passed by Congress they have been enabled to buy large tracts of land, and the testimony before our committee a few days ago on a proposed artillery field gave notice to the committee that they are going right along taking options and buying land, and while we are now involved in the discussion of this bill to make settlement for these hundreds of contracts that have been heretofore entered into, many of them irregular or informal, it seems to me time now, since we are at peace, to stop the further purchase of real estate unless it is specifically authorized by Congress and an appropriation made to pay for it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I will ask the gentleman if the War Department has not now, at this time, title to a large acreage at Fort Sill, Okla., where they are conducting artillery schools, without buying any more land?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is true. I do not care to say anything further.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman's amendment contains this language:

And that any unfinished contracts for the acquiring of real estate are hereby canceled.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. In my district there is a case somewhat similar to the situation in the district of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. The Government established a picric-acid plant and took possession of the land of about 40 people. Options were given in most cases, but those options have now expired. The Government took possession of the land, but the owners have not yet received pay for their land, although they were obliged to get off the land and they lost their crops and the use of the land entirely. Substantial buildings were put up on the land and it is no longer suitable for the use of the original owners. What effect would the gentleman's amendment have on a situation like that?

Mr. McKENZIE. I would say to the gentleman from Michigan that under the bill now pending in the committee those gentlemen will get settlement through the War Department, and what I am aiming at is to cancel all unfinished contracts and prevent the War Department from entering into any more, in order that we may get a final settlement of this whole thing and know where we are at.

Mr. MAPES. Is not the language of the amendment so broad that it would cancel these proposed contracts and prevent those men from getting pay for their land?

Mr. McKENZIE. No; it would cancel the contract, but they would get their pay under the legislation now pending.

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman mean by "unfinished contracts" contracts on which full payment has not yet been made? Let us say a contract was entered into where payment is to be made in installments, where the Government has made improvements and wants to keep the land. Suppose the Government has not paid in full, would that be an unfinished contract?

Mr. McKENZIE. It would not be, because in that case the title has passed.

Mr. ELSTON. Oh, no; the title has not passed. I am speaking of an executory contract, where all payments have not been made and the deed, therefore, has not yet passed to the Government. I think the phrase "unfinished contracts" is rather dangerous to use for the object the gentleman wishes to accomplish, viz, to prevent the Secretary of War from making further contracts for the purchase of land.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. I would like to ask the gentleman how he construes his amendment as applied to this situation, where the Government has an option on real estate and has erected valuable improvements and contemplates availing itself of them? If the contract is canceled, the Government is left with a valuable improvement upon land which it does not own, with no power to acquire title save through condemnation, and I am not sure that in a condemnation suit any estimate of the value of the land covered would be such as to take advantage of the improvements that have been put upon the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order much as I dislike to make the point of order on an amendment of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. DENT. That it is not germane to the purposes of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not care to argue the question, because I think the Chair is familiar with parliamentary procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has nothing to do with the merits or demerits of the proposition, but the Chair is called upon to rule upon the technical proposition as to whether or not the amendment is in order on this bill under the rules of the House. The subject matter before the House is a bill "to provide relief where informal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law." The amendment offered, in the opinion of the Chair, does not relate to the subject matter of this bill at all—is not germane to it—but repeals certain statute law and provides that hereafter officials of the department shall not buy land for Government use unless they have specific authorization from Congress so to do. The Chair does not believe the amendment is germane to the subject matter of this bill and sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offers the following amendment to the bill: "Strike out all after the word 'that,' on line 3, page 3, and insert"——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to offer an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will have to report the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the motion, as disclosed by the reading, is to strike out all and offer a substitute——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is not correct, I include the whole bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "that," on line 3, page 3, and insert the following:

"There is hereby created a committee on war-contract expenditures, to consist of the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, two Members of the Senate, one a Democrat and one a Republican, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and four Members of the House of Representatives, two Democrats and two Republicans, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, with the approval of the committee on war-contract expenditures, be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust, pay, or discharge any agreement, express or implied, upon the basis of reasonable value but in no case greater than the agreed price that has been entered into, in good faith during the present emergency and prior to November 12, 1918, by any officer or agent acting under his authority, direction, or instruction, with any foreign Government or with any person, firm, or corporation for the acquisition of lands, or the use thereof, or for any supplies, material, or equipment to be used in the prosecution of the war, when such agreement has been executed in whole or in part, or expenditures have been made or obligations incurred upon the faith of the same by any such government, person, firm, or corporation prior to November 12, 1918, and such agreement has not been executed in the manner prescribed by law: Provided, That payment under such agreement shall not exceed the fair value of the property transferred or delivered and accepted by the United States, as determined by the Secretary of War, and where no property has been transferred, delivered, or accepted payment shall not be in excess of the actual cost incurred in preparation for performance, as such cost is determined by said Secretary: Provided further, That this act shall not authorize payment to be made of any claim under such agreements after June 30, 1919: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at the beginning of its next session following June 30, 1919, a detailed statement showing the nature, terms, and conditions of every such agreement and the payment or adjustment thereof: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States upon any agreement of the character herein provided for: And provided further, That no settlement of any claim arising under any such agreement shall bar the United States Government through any of its duly authorized agencies, or any committee of Congress hereafter duly appointed, from the right of review of such settlement, nor the right of recovery of any money paid by the Government to any party under any settlement entered into or payment made under the provisions of this act, if the Government has been defrauded, and the right of recovery in all such cases shall extend to the executors, administrators, heirs, and assigns, or any party or parties: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any officer or agent of the United States from criminal prosecution under the provisions of any statutes of the United States for any fraud or criminal conduct: And provided further, That this act shall in no way relieve or excuse any officer or his agent from such criminal prosecution because of any irregularity or illegality in the manner of the execution of such agreement: And provided further, That the names of such contractors and the amounts of such partial or final settlements shall be filed with the Clerk of the House for the information of Congress and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or in the Official Bulletin, or as a public document, 10 days before confirmation and payment is authorized upon such contracts.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it in order for the gentleman to offer his amendment as a substitute before amendments to perfect the text are included?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the substitute, of course, is nothing but an amendment, and the Chair thinks it is in order at this time to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The Chair, however, believes that if any of the Members have an amendment to perfect the text those amendments should be voted on before the vote is taken on the substitute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether the gentleman is now in order to proceed to discuss his amendment and after he has had the floor whether it is then in order to offer an amendment to perfect the text?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to offer an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the amendment before the committee now is the committee amendment to the House bill literally as printed, except that it includes the two amendments which were just passed by the committee as offered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and which have been inserted at the proper places, and a new provision, which is as follows:

That there shall be created a committee on war-contract expenditures, to consist of the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, two Members of the Senate, one a Democrat and one a Republican, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and four Members of the House of Representatives, two Democrats and two Republicans, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

That is new. It creates a committee on war-contract expenditures. That is all. The next paragraph starts out with the declaration "that the Secretary of War"—and this is new—"with the approval of the committee on war-contract expenditures, be, and he is hereby, authorized," and so forth, to do everything that is set forth in the printed bill. The whole proposition is that we, in response to what appears to be a public demand, shall offer to the Secretary of War congressional cooperation in the matter of the settlement of these large contracts.

I endeavored a little while ago to explain just how this might be done and how simple it would be. It should be no embarrassment to the Secretary, except that of fixing a time for meeting this congressional committee, and the Attorney General to cooperate with him as to those particular contracts he properly audited, and which are ready for approval, or for further investigation if it be found that there should be any newly discovered evidence or any reason why they should be further examined.

I hesitated about placing with the President the authority to appoint a committee or a commission, because it might be said that putting the power in the hands of the President at this time and requesting him to appoint a commission—he being absent from the country—would mean delay. For the same reason I am not quite satisfied that the Senate amendment creating a commission would avoid delay, which everyone seems to want to avoid, because the Senate amendment proposes to create a commission that shall be paid a salary of $10,000 per member. That, of course, as we all understand, would mean a long period of service. There is nothing in this proposed amendment except the creation of a committee to cooperate and, if need be, to assist the Secretary of War to see that these contracts are valid, that there is no imperfection or irregularity with regard to them, and that they are properly and promptly paid if found correct. That is the sum and substance of the proposition—that the Congress of the United States shall have oversight and supervision along with the Secretary of War as to contracts, both foreign and domestic, that we are now informed will mount up to more than $2,700,000,000. How many I am unable to say. The Assistant Secretary of War has indicated in the hearings that the American contracts will number six thousand six hundred and odd.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to know from the gentleman what he thinks six Members of Congress, two Senators and four Representatives, could do toward informing this House as to the details of 6,000 contracts in addition to other duties that they must perform, in view of the fact that most Members of Congress, perhaps I might say all of us, would have very little, if any, technical knowledge of the subject covered by those contracts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a fair question. It was asked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] a little while ago, and I attempted to answer it then. The answer was this: The public would be better satisfied and Congress would be better satisfied to know that Members appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker had satisfied themselves that the procedure at the War Department was regular. As to the matter of time and the excess of service that some of us think we perform, I stated then, and I repeat, that no Member appointed upon this committee by the Vice President or the Speaker would hesitate one minute about responding to the call of the Secretary of War to look over his lists. There are 435 Members of the House and 96 Members of the Senate——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are 435 Members of the House and 96 Members of the Senate. And every one of them is in direct communication with the American public. More than 100,000 people do their official correspondence with and through these Members of the Senate and the House. We know, just as the gentleman from New York stated in the case that was brought to his attention a little while ago, when some one "read the hearings on him," that the Secretary of War personally can not attend to all the details of his department. We have multiplying evidence of that fact now, with respect to war-risk claims, contracts, and all sorts of business respecting the discharge of soldiers, and things of that kind.

If the Secretary of War relies upon his subordinates and those subordinates in the matter of contracts are men who have had some interest in the contracts or the awarding of contracts, what more reasonable than that he should welcome the cooperation of Members of Congress to look at his lists? There are six thousand six hundred and odd contracts. Yes; it would take a long time to look over that list. But I assume when the Secretary of War calls its first meeting and this Committee on Expenditures should assemble, he would have a list of at least a thousand contracts ready for their approval or their disapproval, and if they observed that contract No. 1 was made by a distinguished firm of builders, that it had been properly audited, that the amounts were accurately stated, it would not take that committee long to say, "Pass that," and "Pass No. 3; pass No. 4. But hold up No. 1102. I have had a communication about that from one of my constituents. A gentleman has complained to me through the House or the Senate in respect to that contract. Lay that aside until we can make an investigation." And it might happen that there would be dozens of such contracts necessitating further examination and inspection for reasons not known to the Secretary.

Gentlemen, never in the history of the world have we entrusted to individuals such power and confidence as have been reposed by Congress in our public officials in this war. And they have done some extraordinary things. Give them credit for that. But we must not let them get it into their heads that Congress does not still exercise its powers and its prerogatives. We are voting away, if we pass this bill, $2,700,000,000. That is a tremendous tax against the people of the United States. Over in a small room across the way we are now discussing the problem of how to cut down the tax bill from $8,000,000,000 to $6,000,000,000, and here you are spending, or proposing to spend, nearly one-half of the latter amount, about which as a tax proposition there is so much complaint.

I do not reflect upon a single officer of the department with respect to this bill, except to say that sometimes they are overconfident and sometimes they have not welcomed that scrutiny which we, if we had been elected by the people, would have welcomed if we had been in their places.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Does not the gentleman think that this committee ought to be composed of high-class expert accountants, who can devote all their time to this business and receive pay for it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My information is that they have all the expert accountants down in the War Department now that the country and the Government affords.

Mr. PURNELL. Well, then, say business men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then it would mean compensation and delay—the very thing that most of the people have been protesting against. You appoint this congressional committee and let the Secretary lay his cards on the table—that is all he has to do—and if that committee has no information, if no one has made complaint, if there has been no correspondence affecting the contract, if the audit seems clear and plain and just, let the settlement be made. But if there shall be one in a hundred, or two in a hundred, or one in a thousand that savors of crookedness or connivance or favoritism, let it be held up for further information.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I would like the gentleman to say whether he knows if there is an itemized list, or what is approximately an itemized list, in the possession of any Member of this House as to the number of items, and what they consist of, and their amount?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I read the hearings as carefully as I could, and I did not find that any officer of the War Department was prepared to give that list, and I have heard it stated that one of them said it would take as many as 200 clerks quite a long period of time to prepare the list, which seems to justify the suggestion that congressional oversight would do no harm.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska, as the Chair understands, offers an amendment to perfect the text. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. My amendment is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLOAN: Page 3, line 8, strike out "twelfth" and insert "eleventh."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the date, the 12th, which is selected as a focal date here, and insert "eleventh," for the following reasons: First, there was no occasion for any officer of the War Department to enter into any new contracts on the business day of November 11; second, there was no reason why any contractor should impose upon his country, even if the opportunity should present itself for a new contract, after the armistice was signed.

The armistice was signed in the morning of November 11 over there, which was late at night November 10 over here. I read from the Washington Post of November 11—and the Washington Post is a morning paper—this statement:

Germany surrenders. The war is over. The armistice has been signed. It was signed at 5 o'clock this morning, French time. This announcement was made at 2.45 o'clock this morning officially at the State Department.

Now, at that time there is a record, I understand, which shows that the Government had charge of the means of communication, the wires of this country, and there was communication available to every part of this country, and there was no officer in this country but who was reachable at that time, to have stopped further negotiations and entering into new contracts. It seems to me that if we would safeguard the Government's interests and at the same time have due regard for the rights of contractors who were careful in making their contracts, we should change that date from the 12th of November to the 11th.

As I suggested this morning when I was speaking to this question in a general way, the nearer you come to the final time fixed in the bill the closer should be the investigation given to each of these alleged contracts and the greater likelihood there would be that they might be fraught with fraud or irregularity. I do not think we should attempt to validate any contract that was made after the armistice was signed, after an opportunity was given for every official of the War Department and everybody interested to know that fact, and therefore for preparing themselves and protecting themselves against a mistake in the contract or a question of authority.

I want to say in passing at this time that I do not understand that there are many Members of this House who do not desire to pay every obligation honestly entered into by the Government with any contractor. The Government should pay every dollar honestly due, regardless of the formality or informality of these contracts. But I think the American people would be better satisfied if the tribunal that determines their validity, or determines the good faith of these contracts, were some other tribunal than the tribunal named in this bill, and for that reason I heartily agree with the proposition presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. DENT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. DENT. I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order on this amendment. I am under the impression that this amendment is not germane to the proposition involved here. But I am going to withdraw that reservation and leave it to the House to say whether or not at this particular stage of the game they are willing to say that the War Department shall not settle the contracts that happen not to have been formally and ceremoniously executed when they have the right to settle millions of dollars of contracts that were formally executed; and I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the amendment thereto be now concluded.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am very much disposed to renew the point of order. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. It is clearly germane, and there is no use in wasting time upon it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It goes entirely outside of the machinery of the bill.

Mr. MANN. It provides for the payment of the claims. To say that we can not affect the machinery for the payment of the same claims would put us in a very ridiculous attitude.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The only point I make is that it is not germane to the purposes of the bill. It creates machinery that lies outside of the scope of the bill.

This is a bill to authorize the War Department to make settlements, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to create an entirely different machine for carrying out the purposes of the bill.

That is all I care to say about it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The bill before the House has for its object the validating and settling of damages arising out of informal contracts made by the War Department. The bill before the House provides that the Secretary of War, or any of his agents or representatives, can adjust and settle these differences. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] provides a different method or a different agent or a different tribunal to settle these differences. The Chair believes it is germane to the bill before the House. The Chair does not believe the House is confined to the particular method of settlement of these claims that the committee reports. The Chair believes the amendment is germane proposing another vehicle, and it is for the House to determine which shall be adopted. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] to ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] as a substitute and the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. DILLON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DILLON. I have an amendment to perfect the text. I would like to have five minutes upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the request submitted would preclude debate on other amendments.

Mr. MANN. It would not. The request was made to close the debate on——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the request was on the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MANN. The amendment offered would affect the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DILLON. But not an independent amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understood that there was an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] pending to perfect the text, to strike out "twelve" and substitute "eleven."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And until that is disposed of no other amendment to perfect the text would be in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that after the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is voted on, then other amendments to perfect the original text would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MANN. Temporarily I will object, because I want to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not so much interested in the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] as to the date, nor even the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], which probably could do no great harm, but, in my judgment, would do no great good, because I think the committee that would be appointed would have to act pro forma and leave it to the War Department in the end. Now, what is the situation? We went into the war without preparation, without organization, without soldiers, without guns, without ammunition, without methods of transportation, without an army, or the supplies for an army. Everyone understood that great difficulties confronted us in making an army and providing the materials for the Army. By the solemn declaration of Congress we had pledged the resources of the entire country behind and back of the war. We as a part of the Government, and the Government itself, called upon the people throughout the country to aid in furnishing the necessary supplies and in furnishing the soldiers. We passed the selective-draft law, which eventually provided the soldiers.

But soldiers without equipment are not very valuable in fighting in modern days. We had no method arranged in advance to acquire what was necessary to carry on the war. We pleaded that the people from patriotic motives should practically turn over their factories and their business to aid the Government, and we did not stop with pleading patriotic motives. We conferred upon the President autocratic powers over their establishments, and he exercised those powers in many cases.

The great trouble with the Government in all its dealings is red tape. Red tape is necessary in ordinary times, but the commander in chief of an army has to cut red tape frequently if he wins. The criticism that I would have made of the War Department was not that it was too hasty in obtaining supplies, but that it was too slow to begin with, by reason of the red tape provided by law and by regulations. They finally went in and commenced to get the supplies. They practically said, "Red tape be damned! Get the things for the boys, furnish the guns and the ammunition, furnish the machinery and the transportation, do everything that is necessary to hurry up the Army and finish the war." The sooner the war was over the better for the country. The sooner the war was ended the fewer lives would be lost. These people went to work and urged the people throughout the country to aid in furnishing supplies without formal contracts. If the war had continued until now, these agreements would have been disposed of and formal contracts would have been signed; but almost like a flash out of a clear sky came the sudden ending of the war. Few here or elsewhere thought that it was to be ended so soon. The War Department was at the height of its activity in obtaining supplies. I believe that the dignity of the country requires that we should treat these people in absolute good faith and pay our bills; that we should not take advantage of technicalities when we urged them not to [applause]; that we can not afford to repudiate obligations which we were seeking to incur; that when we asked the people of the country to respond and they did respond, we ought not now to plead the baby act and say, "We have no formal contracts with you." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska to strike out "twelve" and substitute "eleven."

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto be concluded at half past 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on the bill and all amendments thereto be closed at 5.30. Is there objection?

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether I can get five minutes?

Mr. KEARNS. I object.

Mr. DENT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the bill and all amendments thereto be concluded at 5.30 o'clock.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the bill and amendments thereto close at 5.30.

Mr. KEARNS. I move to amend that motion by substituting 5 o'clock for 5.30.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote will first be taken on the amendment to the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, as amended, to close debate at 5 o'clock.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "adjust," strike out the words "pay or discharge" and insert in line 5, after the word "implied," the following: "or pay or discharge any liability or damage arising out of or resulting from such agreement."

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of the amendment just read, and of additional ones that I shall offer if this one is adopted, is to confer upon the Secretary of War authority to settle claims by paying damages to persons who have been injured by the Government's operations during the recent emergency.

The bill authorizes the Secretary to adjust, pay, or discharge agreements, express or implied, when expenditures have been made or obligations incurred upon the faith of such agreements. It is clear to my mind that this language means that the adjustment may be made when expenditures have been made or obligations incurred by the injured party, and not by the Government itself.

Under the strict construction now being observed by the War Department and the Comptroller of the Treasury, I doubt if the bill in its present form will provide relief in those cases in which the Government has appropriated lands under informal agreements and injured the landowner by the erection of buildings or factories that are now worse than useless. In cases of this kind the Government ought to have the authority to make settlements by paying adequate damages to the owner of the injured land and leaving the same in his possession. Does anyone believe that the War Department will construe this bill as conferring any such authority?

Without amendments, I doubt if the bill reaches cases like the following one, which arises near Fairmont in the district which I have the honor to represent:

Several months ago representatives of the War Department notified Hon. John F. Phillips, of Fairmont, that they purposed taking about 12 acres of his land, situate on the Monongahela River, for war purposes. Mr. Phillips, not wanting to part with his land, offered the Government the use of his whole farm of 200 acres for the duration of the war without cost, but upon condition that after the emergency was past the land should be restored to its former condition. This offer was refused, and the Government's agents fixed the price of the land at $2,000 per acre and directed Mr. Phillips to execute an option to the Government at this price upon pain of having the land condemned. Mr. Phillips complied. The Government wired an acceptance of the option from Washington, took possession of the land, and destroyed its value, so far as the former owner is concerned, by building a number of massive reinforced-concrete foundations thereon. Soon after the armistice was signed the work on the land in question was abandoned. The Government never completed its contract with Mr. Phillips. The latter brought here a deed, properly executed, and tendered it to the War Department's representative on last Monday in my presence. Thereupon the official having the matter in charge simply said, "Mr. Phillips, your agreement is not binding on the Government, because the Government's agents have not signed the same." Personally I know of no language sufficiently vigorous to describe such an intolerable outrage. It is to provide a remedy for such abuses that I have offered the pending amendment, and purpose to offer others, if this one is adopted, to make it effective.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEELY. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Has the gentleman called the attention of the War Department to the act of June 19—the Hay bill?

Mr. NEELY. No; for it would be a waste of time to do so.

Mr. CALDWELL. The Hay bill provided that in case of war the Government could take any property, business, material, or anything else and pay for it, and if it could not agree with the owner it could pay three-quarters and the man could go to the Court of Claims for the balance?

Mr. NEELY. In this case the War Department refuses to pay anything, on the ground that there is no law authorizing payment in the premises.

Mr. CALDWELL. I know; they do not recognize that the Hay bill is law, and perhaps never will.

Mr. NEELY. But that does not help Mr. Phillips, whose land has been seized and its value destroyed.

Mr. GORDON. With whom did the gentleman talk in the War Department?

Mr. NEELY. With Capt. Dykema.

Mr. GORDON. He has no authority to bind the War Department.

Mr. NEELY. As a matter of fact, Capt. Dykema very frankly admitted that he had no authority to pay Mr. Phillips for his land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, after the word "contracts," strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following: "And provided further, That no payment shall be made on any claim made under this act until an affidavit has been filed, made by the officer or agent, if living, who, on behalf of the War Department, made the agreement or arrangement upon which such claim is based, to the effect that the claim was entered into or made without any benefit or advantage to himself and that he is not interested directly or indirectly in whatever may be paid thereon."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time to discuss the amendment if it is not in order. It seems to me so clearly in order that I do not care to argue it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. DENT. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how anyone who desires that only fair and honest claims shall be paid can object to this amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], it seems from the hearings as read by my colleague [Mr. TOWNER], stated that it was rumored around the lobbies that certain gentlemen were making contracts on behalf of the War Department with their former employers. I will put it much stronger. I know that parties were here making contracts with their former employers. Now, I want to know, this House ought to know, and the country wants to know whether these gentlemen have any interest in these contracts that they have been making. We ought to have known this before any of these contracts were made. We should know it now before any payments are made on them. Gentlemen have objected to criticisms of the War Department in this connection. How is it possible to discuss this question fairly and not make some criticism of the War Department? Nearly all of these contracts date back some six months before the armistice was entered into, and yet gentlemen say the execution of the armistice was the reason why these contracts are not validated. The real reason is that the War Department was paying no attention to the law.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I just want to ask the gentleman how those officers who are now dead can make the affidavits?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have provided for that in my amendment. Unless the agent is alive the affidavit is not required.

Mr. ELSTON. Will it be necessary before any contract can be validated to have it shown affirmatively that the agent who made it for the Government is living? Suppose he is out of the employ of the Government and can not be found.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has not listened carefully to the reading of my amendment. It simply provides if the man is living he shall make the affidavit.

Mr. ELSTON. That it must appear affirmatively that he is not dead. Suppose he is crazy or that he has left the Government's employ and can not be located. They have to have that information before the money can be paid.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman could abrogate almost any law we have with reference to the making of affidavits of lack of interest in the contracts Government agents make on that theory.

Mr. TILSON. Suppose he is in Siberia?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and suppose the sun does not rise to-morrow. The point is that the War Department knows where these men are who have been in the service. This objection of the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] is purely fanciful. If gentlemen want contracts to go through where they know men have been making contracts with their former employers, without an affidavit saying that they are not interested in the contracts, let them say so fairly and squarely. Any Member who has been paying any attention to the letting of these contracts knows that this has been going on. Is it possible that Members care nothing about it?

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. On the point of the practicability of the gentleman's amendment, if an officer was crooked enough to take graft in one of these contracts, does the gentleman think he would hesitate to make an affidavit that he did not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know that his argument would apply against any restriction we have in the statute? We have a number of important restrictions in the law as it stands. Would the gentleman repeal them? This bill has been offered to get around parts of them. It is not necessary we should avoid that part of it. These claims can be paid without any trouble upon these affidavits being made. There will be no difficulty in locating the agents nor, as far as the Army officers are concerned, in obtaining the affidavits, but how some of these men, who were still being paid their salary by their former employers, could make the affidavits is another question in which the country is very much interested.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Dakota until 5 o'clock.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that no contract or agreement shall be paid until an affidavit is made to the effect that the party who made the contract or entered into the agreement verbally or informally for the Government is not in any way interested personally in the payments to be made under the contract and is not to receive or be the beneficiary of any part of the sum paid by the Government on account of the contract.

Now, it seems to me that in this proposed legislation there should be some clear and well-defined provision for having a careful examination and check made of all these informal and irregular contracts which we are providing for to be settled and paid. This careful examination and check should be made by disinterested persons who are in no way under obligations to the War Department and who have not been parties to any of the carelessness and extravagances of the War Department during the war.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] proposes a disinterested check upon these contracts in his amendment now pending before this committee, which amendment provides that before payment shall be made on these irregular and hastily made contracts they shall be approved by a committee composed of the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, two Members of the Senate, and four Members of the House. Notwithstanding the fact that there is a general and widespread feeling throughout the country that many of these claims should be more carefully examined into and more carefully checked up than they are likely to be by the Secretary of War or his representatives, I fear the influence of several thousand war contractors, whose greed for big and easy war profits is yet unsatisfied, will result in having the settlement of these claims placed in the hands of those who will be likely to give the least attention and consideration to the interest of the Government in the settlements and payments to be made.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the very eloquent and pleasing argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], telling of the wonderful accomplishments of the big business interests of the country since the beginning of the war and urging that the payment of these claims be left in the generous hands of the Secretary of War. An argument in favor of open-handed generosity and liberality always appeals strongly to expectant beneficiaries and their friends. Such an argument will always find ready response in the hearts of those who have war contracts with the Government.

While I agree entirely with what the gentleman from Illinois has said in regard to our unpreparedness at the time we entered the war, and while I agree with him that governmental red-tape rules and regulations must be and should be cut in war times, I do not believe that the urgent need of the Government in time of war for war supplies justifies administrative officers of the War Department in paying wholly outrageous and exorbitant prices for supplies furnished to or work done for the Government, nor do I believe such need justifies or excuses administrative officers of the Government in wildly and hysterically spending and wasting millions of dollars of the money of the taxpayers of the country on carelessly considered and impractical projects. I have not been able to learn from anyone acquainted with payments that have been made by the Government on its war contracts that the business interests that have performed these contracts have done so at any loss or at any great business sacrifice. On the contrary, the thing that I have invariably heard from those having these contracts was that there were large, fat, and easy profits in them. The unbridled extravagances in expenditure of the Government's money during the war by the War Department, the Ship Building Corporation, and the Housing Bureau is to-day the common talk of thousands of the employees of these departments of the Government. The time should come, and I trust that the time will come, when the executive and administrative officials responsible for allowing and sanctioning these wild and extravagant expenditures will be held to an accounting by the taxpayers of the country.

In the light of the liberality and abandon with which the Secretary of War has allowed the money of the Government to be spent on regular and formal contracts is it at all surprising that there is a well-grounded general public feeling that if the settlement and payment of these claims growing out of irregular and informal contracts is left entirely with the Secretary of War his generosity and openhandness in the matter of expenditure of public funds will be such as to require the Government to pay millions of dollars more on these claims than in all fairness and justice to all parties concerned should be paid on them? It is well time to call a summary halt on the careless abandon with which administrative officers of the Government are permitting funds of the Government to be paid out in order to make of themselves good fellows with the trade and business interests of the country. If the House does not have the good sense and judgment to provide for a check outside of the War Department upon the settlement and payment of these claims, I trust that such will be done before this measure finally passes the other branch of the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time under order of the committee has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under order of the committee no further debate is in order; amendments are in order. The Chair will recognize gentlemen having amendments to offer to perfect the text before a vote is taken on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BENSON: Page 3, line 18, after the word "law," strike out, beginning with the word "Provided," down to and including the word "Secretary," in line 25.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, can we have the matter striken out reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the part of the bill stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 18, after the word "law," strike out the following language:

"Provided, That payment under such agreement shall not exceed the fair value of the property transferred or delivered and accepted by the United States, as determined by the Secretary of War, and where no property has been transferred, delivered, or accepted payment shall not be in excess of the actual cost incurred in preparation for performance, as such cost is determined by said Secretary.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 3, line 20, before the word "transferred" insert "taken"; also, before the word "transferred" in line 22 insert the word "taken."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 3, line 20, after the words "United States" insert "and in addition a payment not in excess of the actual cost, as such cost is determined by the said Secretary, incurred in preparation for performance of said agreement and the actual outlay incident to cancellation and not included in the cost of articles."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: Page 4, line 2, before the word "after" prefix the word "filed."

Mr. FESS. So it will read——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the language as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

So as amended the lines will read:
"Provided further, That this act shall not authorize payment to be made of any claim under such agreement filed after June 30, 1919."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FESS) there were—ayes 56, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GORDON: Page 5, line 10, at the end of line 10, insert the following:
"And provided further, That before the payment of any claim authorized to be settled by the terms of this bill, the Attorney General of the United States shall certify thereon that the amount allowed is authorized by the provisions of this enactment."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 4, line 2, after the word "nineteen," insert:
"And provided further, That this act shall not authorize payments to be made of any claim under such agreements for aircraft production, including motors and aircraft supplies."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 3, line 25, after the word "Secretary," add the following:
"And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any agreement which in the opinion of the Secretary of War was entered into through misrepresentation or fraud or where the price agreed upon was unreasonable."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that it was in doubt.

Accordingly the committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 3, lines 4 and 5, after the word "express," strike out the words "or implied" and insert "or provable at common law under the statute of frauds."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: Page 3, lines 10 and 11, after the word "corporation," strike out the words "for the acquisition of lands, or the use thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for the use of any lands."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a second amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: Page 3, line 25, after the word "Secretary" insert "and that no adjustment or payment shall include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies received and actually delivered to the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to give the committee an opportunity to have it railroaded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 5, after the word "value," insert "after deducting all claims the Government has against the claimant."

Mr. STAFFORD. So that the phraseology will read——

The Clerk read as follows:

So that the line as amended will read:
"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust, pay, or discharge any agreement, express or implied, upon the basis of reasonable value after deducting all claims the Government has against the claimant."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 104.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is an amendment in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell until the amendment is read.

Mr. CALDWELL. I mean now that the motion to substitute has been passed and voted on?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell until the amendment shall have been read. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: Page 4, line 2, strike out the word "after" and insert in lieu thereof the words "not filed prior to."

Mr. FESS. So that it will read——

The Clerk read as follows:

So that, as amended, the line will read:
"Provided further, That this act shall not authorize payment to be made under such agreements not filed prior to June 30, 1919."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. I do not care to insist on it. It was voted on only a few minutes ago. It was exactly the same thing.

Mr. FESS. The other one was affirmative and this is negative.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 5, at the end of section 1, insert a new section, as follows:
"SEC. 2. If the person, firm, or corporation to whom funds shall be payable under the terms of this act shall be in bankruptcy, in receivership, or an assignment shall have been made for the benefit of the creditors of such person, firm, or corporation, then in such event the amount due any subcontractor, laborer, or material man on account of the carrying out of said contract shall become preferred claims over all other claims in the hands of any such trustee or assignee to whom the funds shall be paid."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment is not yet adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 5, from the last proviso, the following phraseology, found in lines 7, 8, and 9, "and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in the Official Bulletin or as a public document," so that the language will read:

Provided further, That the names of such contractors and the amount of such partial or final settlements shall be filed with the Clerk of the House for the information of Congress 10 days before confirmation and payment is authorized upon such contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not have the Clerk again read it. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out all after the enacting clause of the bill as introduced and substituting therefor the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House providing for the consideration of this bill, the committee will now rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I demand a roll call.

The SPEAKER. A roll call is demanded. Those in favor of taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KING. I raise the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and ten gentlemen present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of passing this bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 270, nays 30, answered "present" 3, not voting 127, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. DENT a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Will the consideration of the river and harbor bill be resumed?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on the bill have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the contract bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all those Members who have spoken on the bill have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 10, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army submitting a statement showing the name of each civilian engineer employed between July 1, 1917, and June 30, 1918, in work of improving rivers and harbors (H. Doc. No. 1667), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3797) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 904), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13440) transferring jurisdiction and control over Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers from the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War for use for Army hospital purposes for the period covered by the exigencies growing out of the present war, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 903), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 10, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, lead us we pray Thee, by Thy spirit through this day; that in thought, word, and deed we may make dominant all that is purest, noblest, best in our being; and thus reflect Thy glory round about us; after the similitude of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 79. An act for the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain in Minnesota; and

H. R. 9865. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands to school district No. 28 of Missoula County, Mont.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 208. Joint resolution providing that one term of the United States district court for the eastern district of Oklahoma shall be held annually at Hugo, Okla.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producting commercial products, had requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. POINDEXTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 28.

Resolved, by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Sunday, the 9th day of February, 1919, be set aside as the day upon which there shall be held a joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives for appropriate exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public service of the late Theodore Roosevelt, former President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

That a joint committee, to consist of five Senators and seven Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, shall be named, with full power to make all arrangements and publish a suitable program for the joint session of Congress herein authorized, and to issue the invitations hereinafter mentioned.

That invitations shall be extended to the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and such other invitations shall be issued as to the said committee shall seem best.

That all expenses incurred by the committee in the execution of the provisions of this resolution shall be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 1423. An act for the relief of Alexander F. McCollam;

H. R. 8444. An act for the relief of Ira G. Kilpatrick and Guy D. Dill; and

H. R. 12194. An act to provide for the award of medals of honor, distinguished-service medals, and Navy crosses, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. WEEKS and Mr. HOLLIS members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 208. Joint resolution providing that one term of the United States district court for the eastern judicial district of Oklahoma shall be held annually at Hugo, Okla.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES FOR THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution 28, which has just come over, which I ask that the Clerk report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 28.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Sunday, the 9th day of February, 1919, be set aside as the day upon which there shall be held a joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives for appropriate exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public service of the late Theodore Roosevelt, former President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

That a joint committee, to consist of five Senators and seven Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, shall be named, with full power to make all arrangements and publish a suitable program for the joint session of Congress herein authorized, and to issue the invitations hereinafter mentioned.

That invitations shall be extended to the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and such other invitations shall be issued as to the said committee shall seem best.

That all expenses incurred by the committee in the execution of the provisions of this resolution shall be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following committee: Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. CANTRILL, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. MANN, Mr. TEMPLE, and Mr. SCHALL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the Speaker to excuse me from membership upon the committee and, if I may be permitted, to suggest in my place the name of Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD, of New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD in place of Mr. MANN.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES FOR THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE TALBOTT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, February 9, 1919, has heretofore been set aside for exercises in commemoration of the late Representative TALBOTT, of Maryland. By authority of two gentlemen from Maryland—Mr. LINTHICUM, who had the day set aside, and Mr. BENSON, who is the successor of Mr. TALBOTT—I ask unanimous consent that the order setting aside February 9 be changed to February 16, on which to hold the exercises upon the life, character, and public services of Mr. TALBOTT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the memorial services for the late Representative TALBOTT be changed from the 9th of February to the 16th of February. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT OF SOLDIERS' ALLOTMENTS, ETC.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have here a letter from the Secretary of War in reference to the payment of allotments, which I think ought to be read to the House. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be read, and also that my reply thereto may also be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 6, 1919.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MANN: My attention has been called to the statements which have been recently made on the floor of the House concerning the delay in making payment to the enlisted men of the Army and of their allotments, and I feel that there is some misunderstanding in the matter which, in justice to the War Department, should be clarified.

With respect to the matter of allotments, I wish to state that the War Department has jurisdiction only in cases where the allotments do not carry family allowances, and that those which do carry family allowances come within the jurisdiction of, and are paid by, the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, Treasury Department.

Concerning the allotments which are payable by the War Department, I wish to state that these payments are being made promptly and that they are not in any way in arrears. There may be, and probably are, cases where there has been some delay due to inability to locate the allottee, but these are few in number, and even in these cases it is hardly likely that any hardship has resulted, as these allotments are not made for the benefit of families. Allotments which are made for the benefit of families and which carry family allowances are not paid by the War Department, but by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance of the Treasury Department. The War Department is cooperating heartily with the Treasury Department in its efforts to solve the intricate business imposed by the sudden assumption of this great undertaking. I do not comment here upon the work of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, because the committees of Congress have already looked into it and have been made acquainted with the almost endless detail which the inauguration of this new and helpful system of insurance and payment entailed, and I refer to the subject only in order that the line of division and responsibility may be made clear, and to assure you that the War Department is in hearty cooperation with the Treasury Department in its effort to solve the problem.

Concerning the pay of enlisted men, I believe that this matter can best be understood by dividing the men into two classes—those who remained in the United States and those who went overseas. With reference to the men who remained in the United States, I wish to state that during the past year the troops at the large camps and cantonments have been paid their monthly pay in full at an average of the fifth day of the month. In many instances payment at these camps, each containing from 40,000 to 60,000 men, has been completed on the last day of the month in which the pay accrued, and in a great many cases payment has been fully made on the first day of the succeeding month. In the early months of the war there was some delay in the payment of the individual cases of men who were transferred from their organizations, which was due to the system then in effect of transmitting their service records. This situation was met and overcome by the inauguration of an individual pay card which the soldier carried in his personal possession, and upon which he could be paid, even though his official service papers were not available at his new station. I mention this so as to show that the department did not fail in its duty to initiate new methods which were required to meet the new conditions of service.

With respect to the troops overseas, payment has not been made as promptly as has been the case of the men who remained in the United States, and it is known that a great many of the sick and wounded who are being returned from overseas, and of whom I shall speak later in this letter, are several months in arrears in their pay. It is to be borne in mind that from July to November of last year the overseas troops were actually in the fighting line, and I think that any delay in their payment can properly be attributed to the conditions of their service rather than to any lack of effort on the part of the authorities of the American Expeditionary Forces. It requires no stretch of imagination to realize the vast difference between paying troops which are in camps or cantonments and paying troops which are in actual action along a wide battle front and operating under conditions of intensive offensive campaign.

It is cases of sick and wounded men coming back to the United States from the field of operations in France which have given rise to the statement that there has been a serious and unwarranted delay in the payment of troops, and when consideration is given to the conditions under which these men were operating in France it is not strange that they should be returned to the United States in arrears in their pay or without proper records showing the condition of their accounts with respect to pay and other items which enter into the computation of their pay and allowances.

When these men reached the United States the department was confronted with the problem of making payment to men who had no records whatever showing the date to which they were last paid, or the condition of their accounts with respect to allotments, insurance, or any other items which enter into the computation of pay. To meet this situation the department made partial payments to these men upon their arrival at the ports of debarkation in the United States, and also partial payments upon their arrival at the various hospitals to which sent, anticipating that the necessary official records would be received shortly after the arrival of the men so as to enable settlement of their accounts in full. When it was ascertained that it would probably be impossible to obtain these records from France, instructions were issued on December 12, 1918, to take the personal affidavits of the men as to the date to which they were last paid and the status of their accounts with respect to their allotment and insurance and to pay them all the arrears of pay due as shown by these affidavits. There is no sanction of law for the action taken by the department, but the situation demanded that measures be adopted to effect payment in full to these sick and wounded men, and the only way to accomplish this was to take the affidavits of the men themselves and accept these affidavits as establishing the correct amounts due them.

The department has made a full and complete report to Congress of its action in issuing these instructions to have the men paid in full on their personal affidavits and has requested that legislation be enacted which will sanction the steps so taken.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1919.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY BAKER: I am in receipt of your favor of the 6th instant, which I shall ask to have read in the House.

The inefficiency of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance would be a burlesque if it were not a tragedy.

Unless the many letters which come to me and other Members of Congress misstate the facts, you are in error in believing that the allotments payable by the War Department are being made promptly and are not in any way in arrears. Nor do I understand that the allotments made by the soldier are not made for the benefit of families. The allotment made by the soldier, as I understand, is made for the benefit, usually, of somebody more or less dependent upon him even in those cases where there is no family allowance by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

I beg to say, also, that I am receiving many complaints from soldiers that they are not receiving their pay and have not received it for many months, in many cases though in dire need of money. That there is unwarranted delay in the payment of sick and wounded men coming home is beyond question, unless the many soldiers who write are all lying about it, and I do not believe that. The Government is utterly failing in its responsibility to the soldiers and to their dependents in regard to pay and allowances. Excuses, of course, will be offered, but what is needed is attention to the business.

My mail is filled with complaints and I am informed the same is true of other Members of Congress.

These are not the only complaints being made against the War Department. While the Government is maintaining an expensive system of officers under the Department of Labor to secure employment for discharged soldiers, the soldiers in the service who have employment awaiting them, and where they are needed, find it in many cases difficult or impossible to secure discharges. It is, I think, just a pure lack of proper attention or proper consideration and humane concern.

Another matter to which I call your attention is the refusal of the War Department to obtain information concerning soldiers who are reported wounded and referring them to the American Red Cross. If a soldier under the War Department has been wounded abroad and is in a hospital of the United States abroad, surely the War Department ought to obtain information and give it to relatives here instead of advising relatives to communicate with the Red Cross. Such action on the part of the War Department seems to indicate an absolute insensibility to humane feeling.

Just as an illustration of the very many letters which are being received by me and others at the Capitol relating to the payment of soldiers in hospitals, I inclose you one letter from Sergt. John J. McAvoy, Company A, One hundred and twenty-seventh United States Infantry, Thirty-second Division, General Hospital 28, Fort Sheridan, Ill., though I confess I fear to send such letters to the War Department for fear it will result injuriously to the soldier. Of course, a part of his letter refers to the failure of the War Risk Insurance Bureau; but how can you reconcile your apparent complacent satisfaction with the pay department of the Army with the statements in this letter, if they be true?

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES R. MANN.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—TUNNEL UNDER HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that reference of the bill H. R. 12588, introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN] to provide for the construction of a tunnel under the Hudson River between the States of New York and New Jersey, which has been referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, be rereferred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PURCHASE OF BONDS BY SOLDIERS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see from the reading of the reply of the letter from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the letter of the Secretary of War that it is quite evident that the gentleman from Illinois has fully recovered his health. [Laughter.] Along that line there is one other suggestion that I desire to make. A new trouble has arisen, and I do not know that anyone else seems to have heard of it. I am getting quite a number of letters from soldiers who have paid for their liberty bonds but who can not get them. It appears that they have made an arrangement by which the money would be taken out of their pay and sent to the Federal Reserve Bank at New York City, the bonds to be then sent to the place designated by the soldier when paid for. They do not get the bond. The soldier writes to me, and then I write to the bank, and find that the matter has passed out of their hands, I do not know how, to the Department of Allotments or to some of their branches. They write back something about the bank, and they have no definite information about the matter. I write back rather briskly, and I get this answer, that they are now waiting for a report from the company commander as to whether or not the soldier has paid for the bonds or not. The bank that got that money and the department that got it knows whether the bond has been paid for. The paymaster's office knows whether it has been paid for, whether the soldier got the pay, or whether it was reserved from his pay. The idea of sending off to France to ask some company commander who may have died in battle, or whose whole company may have died in battle, is absurd and ridiculous. If they have arranged it so that they have to depend upon the company commander to determine whether or not the soldier has paid for his bond, the whole thing has gone to pieces, because every record might be lost in 10 minutes on the battle field and never recovered. I hope somebody may take this in hand and get as much interest in it as I have, so that we may see to it that these soldiers who have paid for their bonds get them and without any delay. [Applause.]

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13462, the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill, with Mr. BOOHER in the chair temporarily, in the absence of the permanent Chairman, Mr. BYRNES of Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13462, the river and harbor bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, at this point I believe it is proper to introduce amendments, because the first paragraph in the bill has been read. Am I right?

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. FREAR. I wish to offer an amendment at this time—in fact, four amendments—which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FREAR: At the end of page 1 insert the following after the word "named," in line 9:

"Provided, That no contract for work herein appropriated for shall be entered into unless the President or the Secretary of War shall first declare that immediate commercial or other public necessity exists for the prosecution of such work and for the use of such project at this time."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, we have made conditions on many projects that have been placed in this bill. Some of them relate to contributions by the locality, others to the performance of conditions. Frequently we have provided that a project shall not be advanced until the Secretary of War is satisfied as to certain conditions. I have gone a step further, and it seems to me at this time of all times it is very important that we should know there is a commercial necessity existing or something imperative that requires the insertion of 70 new projects in this bill and a large increase of appropriations placed in the bill after the engineers make the first recommendation to the committee. And in order that that may be passed upon with some degree of judgment by those who are not interested in the project themselves but who understand the condition of the Public Treasury at this time, I believe this amendment of all amendments should be passed. Now, what does it provide? That no new contract for work herein appropriated for shall be entered into unless the President or the Secretary of War shall first declare that immediate commercial or other public necessity exists for the prosecution of such work and for the use of such project. The Army engineers have not said these 70 projects should be advanced at this time. No one except the committee has placed them there, and I ask if the House is going to permit the committee to say that these 70 projects are important, that these additions which have been made to the various projects—sometimes $2,000,000 in amount—are important and of immediate necessity?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; not just this moment; I will later. We have the position confronting us, and with that position confronting us and with the fact that we are going to sell public bonds to raise money for the improvement and to levy a direct tax I submit, Mr. Chairman, of all times that the President of the United States and the Secretary of War ought to be permitted to pass upon the question, that it ought not to be taken out from their authority, and that this House, without any knowledge of the importance of these projects, should determine if they should be a tax upon the Treasury. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I was going to ask the gentleman if every project in this bill has not been heretofore recommended by the Secretary?

Mr. FREAR. That is not the point. The point is the immediate necessity after they have recommended. Yes; the Trinity River was recommended, the Missouri River was recommended, any number of worthless projects, and some of them have been abandoned. However, that is not the point. The point is the question of immediate necessity. You ought not to be afraid to leave it to the President of the United States or to the Secretary of War.

Mr. DUPRÉ. My first inquiry was to be followed by this one, if I may make it of the gentleman: Does the gentleman think it is the function of the Secretary of War or the President of the United States to appropriate money, or is it the duty of the Congress to do so in its wisdom if it sees fit?

Mr. FREAR. I believe that this House—that we, as the Committee of the Whole House here—are derelict in our duty if we pass this bill in its present form, without the condition put there that the Secretary of War, in certain conditions, may determine whether or not it is proper and timely to make the improvements.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. I do.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know that if we impose that condition that the President or the Secretary of War will send this matter to the engineers in order to get an expert report?

Mr. FREAR. Conceded. Now, the engineers themselves have not asked for these 70 new projects, not one of them. That is the point I make—the engineers themselves have not submitted these. The Chief of Engineers, whatever may be his disposition, determines these questions. Then we have got the responsibility fixed that this is an immediate commercial necessity in his judgment, and we can hold him to that responsibility.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. Was the gentleman in the Hall when the President delivered his message at the opening of Congress?

Mr. FREAR. I have been in the Hall when the President delivered many messages.

Mr. CALDWELL. At the opening of the Congress?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Go on and ask the question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does not the gentleman remember the President said——

Mr. FREAR. I do not care to answer questions of that kind. I believe if the President of the United States or the Secretary of War, if they are willing to pass upon it, we have got something to go upon, but to-day we have not.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and has the testimony before him, of course, as to the relative merits of the projects suggested.

Mr. FREAR. There was no testimony. That is the point; there was no testimony before the committee outside the engineers' reports, and some of them were back five years and more ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I ask for five minutes more. I may not take more than a moment.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman one other question?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TREADWAY. Has not the gentleman sufficient confidence in his colleagues on the Rivers and Harbors Committee to allow them to pass on the merits of the various projects they recommend?

Mr. FREAR. I will say, in answer to that, that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] who questions me was one of those who led one of the recent fights on this very bill two years ago, and for the very reason he did not have confidence in a majority of his colleagues.

Mr. TREADWAY. If I may be allowed to interrupt the gentleman in his time, I will say that that was not the reason.

Mr. FREAR. Then let me say this, that the gentleman from Massachusetts at that time presented a statement, with which I was agreed, that there was a balance of over $30,000,000 in the hands of the Chief of Engineers, which was sufficient for all purposes. At this time $45,000,000 is in the hands of the Army engineers, and you are adding 70 new projects to this bill and you are increasing by several million dollars—yes, a good many million dollars—some of the old projects. Over $15,000,000, as nearly as can be estimated, in all, is the amount that has been added since the engineers first reported to the committee. They reported upon a war basis. Is there anything that can be objectionable to gentlemen on the other side that the President or Secretary of War shall be permitted to pass upon this? If you have an immediate project you want put in without examination, yes. Why not be willing to leave it to the Executive? I certainly am, because I believe you fix responsibility and determine then the importance of the particular project.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania and Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he is not a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and has not been for several years?

Mr. FREAR. I believe the gentleman is quite familiar with the fact that I have been. We have had a good many controversies on the floor and do not always agree on the subject in controversy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true, but the gentleman has been or is a distinguished member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. FREAR. With the exception of the adjective, I accept the correction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I placed the adjective, because it is well bestowed.

May I ask the gentleman further if he presented the amendment he now presents to the Committee of the Whole to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. FREAR. No; but I did this: I asked when the Committee on Rivers and Harbors met that the Chief of Engineers or his representatives should come before the committee, and that a stenographer should be there to take the proceedings, both of which requests were refused.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman if he was a faithful attendant on all the meetings of the committee held on this bill?

Mr. FREAR. I have been as faithful as the average member.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman did not attend all the meetings?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no. I was in attendance here on some very important meetings, where I had the encouragement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania who is now addressing us.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be true.

Mr. FREAR. And certainly I could not be in two places at the same time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are some things that the gentleman from Wisconsin does that the "gentleman from Pennsylvania" approves.

Mr. FREAR. I appreciate it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. "The gentleman from Pennsylvania" was inquiring whether, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin has started his fight against the River and Harbors bill this morning on the basis of the amendment that he now proposes, which would tend to revolutionize the entire system, he had presented this in good faith to the membership of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which he is a member?

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman wants a reply to that, I will say that for four years I presented almost this identical amendment at the beginning of the discussion on this floor. It is not a new amendment. Every member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors who has followed the discussion knows that it has been offered by other Members here on the floor, including the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who spoke a moment ago. It is my recollection that he introduced it and asked that the President and Secretary of War be permitted to do what my amendment asks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not have been the regular order for the gentleman to have presented his amendment to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, so that it might have been discussed by that committee before it came here?

Mr. FREAR. It seems that a member of the committee would have a right to raise that objection, but the gentleman who has spoken, and who has many important projects in this bill, has not the right to take to task any member of the committee, who has a right to do his duty here or elsewhere.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that if I had a very important proposition to lay before the House and country, as the gentleman has, because his is a country-wide proposition, I would lay it before the committee of which I was a member and fight it out there; and if it was defeated there, then, giving notice to my colleagues on the committee, I would bring it into the House.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Do you think it would have made any difference in the results of the committee deliberations if the gentleman from Wisconsin had presented it to the committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It might not if all the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors agreed with the gentleman from Illinois who just asked the question and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], with whom he agrees; of course not.

Mr. GALLAGHER. It might make some difference if it was offered to the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If those two gentlemen were unalterably opposed to river and harbor improvements—and I would not say in favor of railroad domination of the country—then it might be we could never get the question I am raising before the House unless some gentleman outside of the committee ventured to do what I am doing now—call the attention of the larger body to the fact that when a member of the committee had a chance to present his amendment to his own committee he did not do it, but brings it suddenly on the full membership of the House when the members of his committee did not have full notice.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether I correctly understood the gentleman from Wisconsin or not, but I gathered the inference from his remarks that there were some of these new projects incorporated in this bill that did not have the specific recommendation or indorsement of the Board of Engineers. Is that true?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not a member of the committee. I can not answer that.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me say this to the gentleman from Alabama, however: That the time has come for new projects to go into this bill. The people of this country, this United States, have been waiting since the war began for improvements in their own country. They have been making vast appropriations and great sacrifices to help the people of other countries. They have been aiding canals elsewhere. Their money has gone to the construction of railroads in France while they have been suffering in the United States for lack of decent and sufficient transportation facilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to interrupt the gentleman with a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Understand, I am not in opposition to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman is not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But it has been my impression heretofore that it was impossible to procure the insertion of any item in the river and harbor bill without the backing of the Board of Engineers. That has been the policy, as I understand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that has been so; otherwise there would be fair ground for the criticism of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and to the gentleman from Alabama that there is not a project incorporated in this bill but has the indorsement of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think for myself that there ought to be some which have not got the indorsement of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that statement were agreed to, it would be up to the gentleman from Wisconsin to challenge it. He is a member of the committee.

Mr. FREAR. I have specifically admitted it, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman from Wisconsin stands in direct opposition to the Army engineers.

Mr. FREAR. They have abandoned some of the projects they urged years ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are any of those abandoned projects in this bill?

Mr. FREAR. One is modified. It has not been abandoned. But that is immaterial. I speak of that simply as regards their own judgment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I speak of the gentleman from Wisconsin as in general opposition to the bill and in general opposition to the War Department, and he does it in a broad, general way apart from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which he is a member, where, if he had attended regularly the meetings of that committee, he might present his opposition.

Mr. FREAR. I presume I have attended the meetings of the committee as regularly as the average Member, and as regularly as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has attended the meetings of the committee to which he belongs. But I have not discussed or criticized the War Department any more severely than has the gentleman who has just spoken, and that within the last two or three days, and I believe that is his province and his duty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have done that in regard to the failure of the War Department to pay soldiers' allotments and allowances and to make discharges, and I will continue to do so as long as it appears that our public officials are not making prompt settlement with our soldiers and their dependents.

But that has nothing to do with this. I am in favor of construction and reconstruction within the United States. I was just pointing out that we have made liberal appropriations and allowances, and have undergone vast sacrifices and imposed heavy taxation upon our people for reconstruction in other climes than our own; and during all this time, when we have been sapping the business life blood of our Nation and the physical life blood of our men and women for the benefit of other peoples, our new river works have remained idle, have stood still. We have failed to make appropriations for ourselves. We have fallen behind in the matter of our commercial relations with foreign nations. We have not brought ourselves up to date in the vital matter of transportation, and we have permited ourselves to go almost exclusively into the hands of those controlling existing transportation methods without giving ourselves the benefit of a competitive means of transportation.

Now, this bill proposes to reconstruct—to construct and reconstruct—the waterways of the United States in order that this infernal railroad inadequacy and congestion may be relieved. [Applause.] And the gentleman from Wisconsin, who opposes this bill in toto, and who seems opposed to the principle of waterway improvements, who rejects the recommendations of the United States Army Engineers who are endeavoring to give us a competitive transportation system in this country, stands to hamstring the business people of the United States, to compel them to pay the highest possible freight rates, to compel them, when there is plenty in certain parts of the land, to pay the highest prices in other sections where they can not get food supplies, and to hold back and throttle forever the opportunity that the people generally demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, pending the gentleman's remarks, may I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] advocates the abdicating by Congress of its function of legislating as to all new projects included in this bill. The proposition is not a new one. It was presented last year by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who urged it because we were in the midst of war, with war facing us with all of its difficulties. But this House, none the less, decided to hold the legislative part intact and firm in its own hands; and to-day the gentleman from Wisconsin again urges that we place the function which belongs to us in the hands of the President, that we abdicate and give to him the right to legislate, regardless of the fact that we have considered deliberately and in the regular way the subjects as to which he says we should hand over to the Executive our rights and our functions.

And does he in any way justify the abdicating by Congress of its rightful function? Does he point to any unworthy project in the bill? Does he give a bill of specifications, and does he turn to the items and say, "Here is an unworthy project"?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Just a moment, and then I will. Does he say, "There are 70 new projects, and among those new projects I specify that such and such projects are unworthy of being improved"? Oh, no. He makes a general indictment. He does not turn to any one item and show that that project should not be improved. He says, generally, we should turn our back upon progress. We should not in this great and growing country of ours, with all its need of increased transportation, have any new projects, however worthy, unless after we have passed the bill with deliberation and consideration the President says we are right by specifically writing his approval of each new project. That is the proposition in its nakedness, and that is all there is to it. Now I yield to the gentleman and ask him to specify which one of these 70 projects he criticizes, which of them is wrong, which of them this Congress should not approve? Or, I ask him the broad and general question, Is he opposed to all improvements unless, after Congress has passed the bill, the President invests himself with our functions and relegislates in our behalf? Is that his proposition?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman asks me a question, and he makes a long and extended argument in regard to it. I will say this in response, that when this country is facing a deficit of $18,000,000,000 in the Treasury I do not feel that it is dangerous to submit to the President or to the Secretary of War the question of the commercial necessity of these 70 new projects, and I ask the gentleman to say which of these 70 new projects he considers is of vital necessity at this time that he thinks the President or the Secretary of War would not approve of?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will say in answer to the gentleman two things. He asks me to specify a project, and I will give him one as an illustration. I will point the gentleman across the country to Beverly Harbor, and I will tell him that if Beverly Harbor had been improved as we propose to improve it, New England last winter, that great and prosperous part of the country, which contributed as much as any other part of this Nation to the waging of the war, would have been warmed; that its people would not have suffered for lack of coal, because we would have been able to furnish a way to distribute by water the coal to those people who needed it.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, I will specify that as one of the instances. And then, on the general proposition, I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of War has already approved of each one of these projects, approved of it specifically after thorough examination, and that approval was before this committee, and was one of the things that influenced us; not all, because we do not believe that we ought to be bound solely and wholly by the judgment of the Secretary of War. We believe we are sent here ourselves to legislate, and that we ought to give the country the benefit of our own thought and consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FREAR: At the end of page 1 insert the following:

"Provided, That prior to any expenditure of public moneys under this bill the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that there now exists, or shall secure satisfactory assurances that local interests will provide sufficient areas of water frontage and suitable public water terminals adequate for the traffic which shall be open to the public on equal terms and as conditioned in the upper Cumberland project contained in this bill."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this subject has been discussed not only in the committee but on the floor by the chairman of the committee. We are all familiar with the fact that the Government heretofore has gone on in the case of the Ohio River and has expended something like $59,000,000 without a single water terminal. We are asked here to improve many different waterways without public terminals; and if we are going to be consistent we will make the same condition that we have made in the case of the upper Cumberland and other waterways without favor, and say, "If this project is to be improved, you must provide satisfactory terminals before the Government will put its money into this project."

Now, the Chair is well aware of this fact, and so is the committee, that after an amendment is offered different members of the committee or Members of the House have the privilege, particularly if they are interested in projects in this bill, of assailing the Member who offers the amendment, and that there is no chance to answer them. For instance, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who just spoke, has more money secured for Philadelphia in this bill, and for its immediate neighborhood, than any gentleman—nearly one-quarter of the bill. I do not question his interest, but I do say that when he says I am opposed to the principle of waterway improvement he must know that that statement is untrue. I have approved constantly of the improvement of deserving waterways. Why, as the gentleman himself said a day or two ago on this floor, we are taking the blood from the people of this country. We certainly are. We are facing a deficit of $18,000,000,000. Six and a half million dollars are appropriated in this bill for the Delaware River and the waterways immediately surrounding Philadelphia when only $900,000 were recommended by the engineers to the committee in the first place, and $5,500,000 have been added for the Delaware River, for the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, and for the Schuylkill. When this is proposed, I ask that the Secretary of War may tell the country of the immediate necessity for that expenditure, because when we are taking the money out of the blood of the people, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania well says, it seems to me it is time for us to know the importance of these expenditures.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman's statement were true about the Delaware River and about the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I wish it were true that we were getting so much as the gentleman indicates. I am glad to take the gentleman on his own proposition as to whether the Delaware River is worthy of improvement or not.

Mr. FREAR. That is not the question. The question is that the gentleman has just charged me with not being willing to improve waterways, and the gentleman has secured $6,500,000 for projects around Philadelphia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I challenge that.

Mr. FREAR. Let me enumerate them: Two and a half million dollars for the Delaware River, $1,000,000 for the Schuylkill, right there at Philadelphia, and $3,000,000 for the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, which the gentleman time after time and year after year, and I am afraid successfully, has been urging as a project which the United States Government should take over.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is in the States of Delaware and Maryland.

Mr. FREAR. And Pennsylvania and Philadelphia hold practically all the stocks and bonds that are invested in that canal, and the gentleman has been a most ardent exponent and advocate of that canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman admits that.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman, whose eloquence could secure almost anything. But let me say this——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We need these improvements for national reasons.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, there is no project in the bill but what is put in as a national proposition. Now, in regard to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], I made a statement which was not repeated correctly. I said, Is there a proposition which the gentleman knows of that the President and Secretary of War would not approve? He says Beverly Harbor—would not the Secretary of War approve it? That is the only question, and I had no fear or question about it. The House votes down the proposition. We required proper terminals on some of these propositions, and why not on all of them?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer a third amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of page 1 insert the following:

"Provided, That no contract for work hereinafter appropriated shall be entered into until the city, county, or State, or any other agency, shall have deposited with the Secretary of War, in some bank to be designated by him, an equal amount for the sum herein appropriated, which sum shall be expended by the Secretary of War in the prosecution of said work."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is a question of contribution. It has been urged in this House and in the Senate on various occasions. There is no reason why, as suggested in the amendment, Nawiliwili Harbor, Hawaii; the Sandusky port, on Lake Erie; and many other different projects which I can enumerate are required to contribute to the improvement, while nine out of ten of the other projects do not contribute a dollar. Why is this partiality shown? Let us, if we are going to give them these sums, do as they do in European countries, say to the localities that they must give a certain amount to show their earnestness in regard to the improvements. Do not make the Government contribute at all. And if we are going to contribute it all, let us say we will do so impartially. What right have we to say to Nawiliwili Harbor that they shall contribute $100,000 and make good terminals before a dollar will be expended by the Secretary of War? What right have we to do that except that they have not a Delegate with a vote to cast? He can only speak on the floor. I know the islands give a great deal more to the revenue of the Government than they have got back. If we are going to be fair, just, and honest in this thing with these various communities let us treat them all alike. Let us have good faith on the part of the community in that they are willing to make some contribution, that they believe in the improvement.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does the gentleman's amendment apply to new improvements?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and necessarily so.

Mr. ROBBINS. If you take Pennsylvania, no county could contribute anything to rivers and harbors under the constitution.

Mr. FREAR. The answer obviously to that is that I believe in changing the present system and adopting one so that communities may contribute. You could change the constitution of Pennsylvania. Why should Pennsylvania get $6,500,000 in this bill while Nawiliwili Harbor only gets a few thousand dollars and is obliged to contribute $100,000?

Mr. ROBBINS. That is no answer.

Mr. FREAR. It is an answer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is because $21,000,000 per annum comes in through Philadelphia and nothing comes in through Nawiliwili.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; Hawaii contributes more to the country than she gets out of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am speaking of Government revenue that comes in through the improvements.

Mr. FREAR. I am speaking of revenue that comes from Hawaii, and I know they give far more to the Government than they ever receive.

Mr. ROBBINS. Take the harbor of Erie, Pa.; we know that it is necessary to improve it by reason of the damage to the breakwater by a storm.

Mr. FREAR. Just as at Nawiliwili Harbor, which has a breakwater, and we say to them, "You must give $100,000 before the Government will contribute a dollar. You people have not any vote on the floor, although you pay more taxes than you receive back, but we make that as a prior condition." Why should we do that?

Mr. ROBBINS. Because Nawiliwili Harbor is a Territory.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; but they pay more money to the Government than they get back.

Mr. ROBBINS. You can not apply your rule to any State in the Nation.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Why not make your rule work the other way and abolish all contributions? You would reach the same result logically.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say that many projects in this bill would never appear here if the people were obliged to make contributions. They will get all they can from the Government Treasury because they have no responsibility on their side. All they have to do is to come and beg first of the Army engineers and then put the thing through the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment here which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of page 1, insert the following:

"Provided, That work on any new project herein adopted shall not be commenced until the Secretary of War is satisfied that railroad connections have been made or will be made within reasonable time to make the project accessible to the communities whose commerce is properly tributary to such waterway, as provided in conditions for improvement of Nawiliwili Harbor in this bill."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, that relates to the same general proposition, excepting here in that case they require them to establish railways to bring all of the traffic down to the harbor of Nawiliwili. That is, the committee has done that in addition to their paying $100,000 into the Treasury before a dollar will be expended upon the part of the Government. I did not mean to say that there was no Delegate from the Hawaiian Islands. There is, but he has not a voice in the determination of this bill; as we all know, he can not vote. We can tax Hawaii as we choose. We can give them whatever we choose and make whatever conditions we choose. They have no one here who can tell on the floor what should be done who can vote. That is the point I make. Here is a condition, and I do not know that it is not a proper condition. I rather think it is, but it should be generally imposed, if so, on all projects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin knows that the Delegate from Hawaii has a right to speak on the floor.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; but he has not the right to vote.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman wants to do justice to the Delegate from Hawaii, with whom he is on very good terms.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, surely. We are all on good terms with him, a very estimable man, and I do not think that project should be singled out and such conditions made there unless the condition is made on projects generally. The chairman of the committee on the floor talked for half an hour almost on that one subject of terminals, and let me say that he talked well, and I think no one can fairly raise any objection to that proposition, that the Government should not make expenditures unless there are terminals built by localities, and he was addressing himself largely to the Ohio River. If the Ohio River ought to have it—and we have spent $59,000,000 there with very little result—and if the Missouri River ought to have it—and we have spent $24,000,000 there with very little result—why not make it general with all? That would seem to me the only fair condition, and that is the reason that I have offered the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tenants Harbor, Me.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 12, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $12,500.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The other day at the conclusion of his remarks the chairman of the committee made a statement which in substance was that men who objected to this river and harbor bill were not intellectually honest. That would include a large part of the House membership, if true. I desire to present just a few brief remarks in this connection, which I think may be of interest at the outset of this bill. I oppose this 1919 river and harbor bill, not from any personal or local injury, fancied or real, but because the bill is vicious and wasteful in character. I am not acting alone as a Representative from Wisconsin in this opposition, but for taxpayers throughout the country, who are equally concerned in its defeat.

Members of the committee in past years have poked fun at all western waterway traffic. Let me say my own State represents more actual waterway traffic than that of any other member of the committee, with one exception. Wisconsin stands second in waterway commerce of all the States in the country. Last year four of its harbors, taken from a dozen of its ports, handled over 70,000,000 tons of waterway traffic, hauled on the average over 800 miles. The total appropriations for these four harbors reached $11,670,000 in the last 50 years. The greatest river in the world, without a boat line upon it, also flows past my district, a hopeless, deserted stream.

In general debate on this bill I was severely criticized by Chairman SMALL of the committee, who hails from North Carolina. I ask the House to judge between us as to our comparative interests and intellectual honesty. On pages 8, 9, and 10 of this bill over $1,500,000 is carried for North Carolina rivers, canals, and rivulets that were placed in the bill after the engineers' reports were first sent to the committee, according to the committee memorandum book. This is more than ten times all amounts in this bill appropriated for Wisconsin's waterways, and yet all the actual North Carolina waterway traffic does not reach one-hundredth part of that of Wisconsin. The chairman of the River and Harbor Committee comes from North Carolina. One river in North Carolina—the Cape Fear—with its tributaries, has already received from the Government Treasury for so-called improvements $7,730,168, or more than has been given the second harbor in the world at Superior-Duluth; yet this river's commerce last year was less than 1 per cent of that of this Wisconsin harbor.

The bill before us carries $554,000 more for that one North Carolina stream, or over five times as much is in the bill for that river, as for all the Wisconsin projects put together. Again, $1,000,000 more is carried in the bill for two insignificant North Carolina waterways that do not handle in real commerce 5 per cent of the waterway traffic of the little harbor of Ashland, in my own State. North Carolina, the home of the chairman of the committee, also gets six new projects in the bill, more than any other State in the Nation; and with this astounding record of having four feet in the hog trough, the chairman of the committee from that State seeks to distract attention from his many appropriations by criticizing me personally.

Returning to other waste contained in the bill, Wisconsin has one harbor, Superior-Duluth, that has received from the Government in the past about the same amounts as the Cumberland River, and yet that Wisconsin harbor handled over five hundred times the actual commerce of the Cumberland River last year and shipped it ten times as far. In this bill the Cumberland River will receive $340,000, in addition to $7,108,767, which will begin another hopeless $4,500,000 canalization project on that river. Yet I am criticized by the chairman for protesting against this indefensible waste of public money. Again, one of Wisconsin's five largest harbors last year handled three thousand times as much traffic as the hopeless Missouri River, which project was first rejected by Col. Townsend. The Missouri River, in addition to over $24,000,000 thus far received from the Government, gets $400,000 more in this bill for a so-called commerce of less than 15,000 tons last year. Compared with this, about $100,000 is given in this bill for all the Wisconsin harbors, that handled over 70,000,000 tons last year.

Yet I am criticized for exposing such colossal waste contained in this bill. I could extend comparisons to many other old and new wasteful projects in the bill, but I am content to place these facts, taken from the 1918 engineers' records, before the country, and to say that with $45,000,000 balance on hand at this time for waterway expenditures and $18,000,000,000 indebtedness confronting the Nation, it is worse than foolhardy to finance such miserable reckless waste through liberty-bond sales and burdensome direct taxes. That is the issue, and no effort of the chairman of the committee or anyone else can sidetrack that issue.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I suppose a brief comment is in order. In reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], I desire to say that after the gentleman made almost an hour's speech upon this bill, when the committee was considering it under general debate, I used this language with reference to the gentleman and his speech:

He says this "wicked" bill is going to pass the House, carrying with it the indictment that the membership of this House will support a bill not in the public interest, involving a waste of the public money. It is an unfair, unjust, unjustifiable criticism of the committee and of the House. I make this expression immediately after the gentleman has concluded. I do not make it unkindly; but the gentleman has not made a criticism of this river and harbor bill creditable to a man seeking only the truth and desirous of doing only justice and fairness. I do not impute the slightest moral turpitude to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I have studied the gentleman from Wisconsin, trying to ascertain something about his mental methods. The only way I can account for them—because I do not impute the slightest lack of moral conception to his make-up—is that for some reason or other on river and harbor legislation the gentleman has great difficulty in being intellectually honest. In all truth and fairness I commend that criticism to the gentleman, with the hope that in good time he will reform.

I made that statement extemporaneously, but deliberately. I have had no occasion to palliate it or withdraw it. I do not think anything has occurred this morning which justifies any withdrawal of the statement.

The gentleman says a good deal about North Carolina and North Carolina projects. The gentleman intends, I presume, to say that as chairman of the committee I took advantage of my position to favor unworthy projects in North Carolina. If there is a single member of the committee other than the gentleman from Wisconsin who believes it, I not only invite but I urge him to say so. If there is a single Member of this House who has the slightest idea that the gentleman's imputation is correct, I invite and urge him to say so. This is a great body. This House makes up its mind about Members. It is not what the gentleman from Wisconsin says, it is not what I may say about myself. It is the verdict of the House that counts, and the verdict of this House, based on my experience of 20 years, is honest and just to every Member of the House. I am willing to leave my reputation for fairness and integrity and for such intelligence as I may possess to the membership of the House. The gentleman from Wisconsin, whether he likes it or not, must do likewise.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Boston Harbor, Mass.: For maintenance, $40,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The chairman of the committee has stated that this is in no sense a personal controversy, and I do not believe that either of us will engage in that, because he is not built along those lines, nor am I. He says as chairman of the committee that it is charged that he took advantage of his position, and that is the criticism. Is there such a criticism? I have simply stated the facts. There are many things which I did not wish to state until the gentleman impugned my intellectual honesty, but I now say that his State, by a peculiar accident, let us say, gets more projects than any other State in the Union; that it gets $1,500,000, that do not carry one one-hundredth part of the commerce of my own State.

It was added after the engineers had reported, and the chairman from North Carolina, passing upon the 70 projects, recommended them to the committee. Is not that so? Now, with that situation, can he challenge me with intellectual dishonesty when a proposition like that confronts the House? Think of it! Take this proposition just passed. I do not oppose it. I do not intend to move to strike it out. The proposition in regard to Tenants Harbor—why, it is for the benefit of one boat, one single boat. Read the engineer's report on page 7:

The chief reason for the demand for increased depth in Tenants Harbor is the need for a channel that can be used at all stages of the tide by the sea boat which connects Tenants Harbor with Rockland and Portland, Me., and affords the customary means of transportation. This vessel draws about 13 feet. The business of the steamboat above referred to which is operated by the Eastern Steamship Corporation, amounted during the calendar year 1911 to 1,339 tons of freight and 1,000 to 1,200 passengers.

I am not going to move to strike it out, but at this time in the history of the country, with the condition of the Treasury as we know it, you ask that the item here ought not to be allowed. I am going to ask after a while what projects should be allowed that are of imperative necessity. Are you going to permit six projects of North Carolina to go into the bill, the Newbegun, Scuppernong, and other creeks down there? I am afraid they are to go in. But I do not propose to permit the chairman or anyone else on this floor to question my intellectual honesty in order to cover up such matters. I leave it to the House to determine who selected these new projects carrying a million and a half dollars for North Carolina when he presented the 70 projects which were adopted in this bill to the members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gloucester, Beverly, Salem, Lynn, Plymouth, and Provincetown Harbors, Mystic, Malden, Weymouth Fore, and Weymouth Back Rivers, and Dorchester Bay and Neponset River, Mass.: Completing improvement of Weymouth Fore River, $183,000; completing improvement of Beverly Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 220, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document as modified in the report printed in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 8, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $61,500; in all, $244,500.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, strike out "completing" and substitute in lieu thereof "for."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this simply corrects a clerical error. The appropriation does not complete it, and therefore the word "for" should be substituted.

M. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. TREADWAY. As I recollect the item, this amount of $61,500 is one-half of the total appropriation required to complete Beverly Harbor?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is $123,000, if I remember rightly the engineers' estimate.

Mr. SMALL. I think the gentleman's recollection is correct.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pollock Rip Shoals, harbor of refuge at Nantucket, New Bedford and Fairhaven Harbors, Fall River Harbor, and Taunton River, Mass.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance of Pollock Rip Channel, $200,000.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question if the gentleman from North Carolina will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I would like to inquire with reference to the intent of carrying out this project at Pollock Rip Shoals, Harbor of Refuge at Nantucket, New Bedford, and so forth, continuing improvement, and for maintenance of Pollock Rip Channel, $200,000. When does this sum of $200,000 become available and how is the money to be expended?

Mr. SMALL. I will say the appropriation becomes immediately available upon the approval of the act, and this is a continuation of the improvement which has heretofore been carried on at Pollock Rip Shoals, and I may say to the gentleman that with which he is entirely familiar, that the result of this matter has been most favorable and the channel has remained stable.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am very glad to hear the chairman make this statement, because there was considerable opposition at the time the improvement was begun there for fear the same would not become permanent. But what I wanted to ascertain was, as the probability is there will be little, if any, expenditure in the Fall River Harbor, because the tide is very strong in that harbor, and therefore the harbor will naturally be provided for in the cleansing, and I was only inquiring what the expenditure would probably be in the other places, if estimated by the engineers. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. SMALL. There was so much confusion, I could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I asked as to the probable expenditure in the Harbor of Refuge, Nantucket, New Bedford, and Fair Haven Harbors, Fall River Harbor, and Taunton River, Mass. I presume the expenditure will be very small in the places mentioned.

Mr. SMALL. Yes; there is no estimate of appropriation for any of the places mentioned. The $200,000 is intended exclusively for the continuing of the improvement at Pollock Rip Shoals.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Connecticut River below Hartford, Conn.: For maintenance, $15,000; for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 132, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, $75,000; in all, $90,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I approve of this item included in the bill, which is a new project, in accordance with the report submitted by the Engineers in reference to the lower Connecticut River. There are two sections of the Connecticut River, so called, as far as improvements are concerned, the lower section being that from Hartford down and the upper section running from Hartford to Holyoke, Mass., which is in my district. For some time an effort has been made to improve navigation in the so-called upper Connecticut River. A new survey was authorized in the Sixty-second Congress and a report was incorporated in House Document No. 417, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. The Chief of Engineers, Gen. Kingman, in that report made distinct recommendations relative to the improvement of the upper Connecticut River. His recommendation in brief was:

That the Government should appropriate $1,870,000, with $65,000 for annual maintenance, and that there should be constructed a lock and dam at Enfield under private interest, and that the total expense of $3,950,000 should be met by the Government if this lock and dam was not commenced within a reasonable time by the private interest referred to.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That was the recommendation, I understand, of the district engineer, but it was not approved by the division engineer, the Board of Engineers, the chief, that part of it?

Mr. TREADWAY. This is a report, if this quotation is correct, of Gen. Kingman, Chief of Engineers, to the Secretary of War, paragraph 3.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman does not mean to say the Chief of Engineers approved of that recommendation?

Mr. TREADWAY. The Chief of Engineers, Gen. Kingman, approved the statement I make, quoting from him, which appears in House Document No. 417, Sixty-fourth Congress. I think the chairman of the committee has the report before him or on his desk, and will vouch for the correctness of my statement.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has read correctly from the report. Would the gentleman from Iowa care to have the report referred to to read?

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, my particular interest in the adoption of this report comes from the definition of what may or may not be regarded as a reasonable time. I misunderstood that phraseology when I first read the report, but was corrected by Gen. Taylor in a conversation with him in reference to the subject matter. The "reasonable time" would date from the time of the adoption of the project by the Federal Government. So I submit that, in view of the dire need of the improvement of the upper Connecticut River, we should adopt the project and have that time underway to which he refers as reasonable, up to the time the Government should expend the total sum of $3,500,000.

Now, the upper Connecticut River project has been before Congress for many, many years, long before I was a Member of this body. In the Sixty-second Congress the project at that time, as favored by the Board of Engineers, became a part of the river and harbor bill in the Senate. When the bill went to conference the Senate amendment, including this project, was not agreed to. So it never has become a law. The whole matter hinges on the possible cooperation between private interests, anxious to secure the development of water power, and the Government's desire to secure navigation. The interest of Congress, of course, is solely that of navigation. The interest of the people involved is both, one as necessary as the other. The adoption of that project as a navigation project means 12 feet of water from Hartford to Holyoke, passing through a most fertile section of the country, a very thickly populated section, offering and having great industrial possibilities. There probably is no section outside of thickly metropolitan settled districts more industrially occupied and engaged than the particular reach within the Connecticut area. In addition, there is the greatest need of hydroelectric power.

The document to which I referred called attention to the saving of one item of coal alone in transportation for the population as then reported upon. There would be an annual saving on the basis of coal consumption at the time this report was made by Col. Abbot of from $200,000 to $300,000 annually. The various kinds of freight available, both outgoing and incoming, is almost unlimited. The mills of that immediate vicinity need the raw material. They need to get their finished product to the market. And it seems to me that we ought, as the representative body of the people——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TREADWAY. We ought to begin the period, wherein the Government may or may not cooperate, to secure this 12 feet of navigable water in this reach of 34 miles from Hartford to Holyoke. There is no question of the merit of the project. The only question involved is this relationship between the development for navigation and the development for power purposes. I realize that that subject has been a mooted question before Congress. This body has passed one bill, the Senate has passed another, and there it has been hung up almost indefinitely, certainly during the life of the last two Congresses, and what the prospect may be of amendments to the so-called Adamson general dam act, in a way that will permit of this dual relationship, nobody knows. Therefore when there is so much involved in the commercial welfare of a section as is based solely on the navigation feature, as provided by this report, it seems to me that we could do no more than to include this as one of the projects well worthy of adoption by Congress.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. It has not been the fault of the private individuals, either, that this improvement has not taken place, I would suggest to the gentleman, but the fault was with Congress or with the Government in not permitting them to go on with this improvement.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is absolutely correct. I am glad he refreshed my mind on that point. At the time it seemed probable that this project would be adopted in the Sixty-second Congress a large private corporation stood ready to undertake the private development to which the gentleman from Connecticut refers, and while, of course, we have no positive assurance that that cooperation could be secured to-day, nevertheless it is fair to assume that it could be secured, because the possibility of the development of 30,000 or 40,000 horsepower annually makes a satisfactory and desirable business proposition. It is only fair to anyone who is asked to put their personal money into such a project that the Government show its good faith by first adopting the project. That is why I am bringing the matter before the House to-day; not for its immediate action, because I am willing to bow at the present time in deference to the judgment of the committee that it should not be included in this present bill.

I appeared before the committee, stated the case as best I could, and am willing now to accept the judgment of the committee that the relationship between the two features, namely, navigation and power, should take further form before this project is adopted. But I do not think we should be asked to wait indefinitely for general legislation. I personally do not think that should apply to this particular project. I realize that the action of the committee was in their best judgment. They did not, as I understand it, pass an adverse judgment on the project, but asked for its further delay. Our people hope that that period of further delay is soon to expire. We have been very patient, have waited long and as patiently as we could, but if within a short period the judgment of the committee should be reversed it certainly would be very beneficial to the sections which I in part have the honor of representing.

I think I have made all the statement in connection with the matter that I care to, other than to ask, Mr. Chairman, that I may be allowed to extend my remarks and incorporate a memorandum that I left with the committee at the time of the committee hearing.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 14, 1918.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: In compliance with your suggestion made when I appeared before your committee on December the 11th advocating the adoption of the Connecticut River improvement project, I am pleased to submit the accompanying statement to the committee supplementing the testimony I then presented.

Sincerely, yours,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

Statement furnished the Rivers and Harbors Committee by Representative ALLEN T. TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, in support of the adoption of the Connecticut River project between Hartford, Conn., and Holyoke, Mass., in accordance with Document No. 417, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

1. The subject of Connecticut River navigation has been so continuously before Congress that only the briefest review need be made of its history. In the Sixty-first Congress, second session, Document No. 818, the Secretary of War transmitted a favorable report from the Chief of Engineers upon the project in cooperation with private enterprise which would secure a development of power. Following this report, in the Sixty-second Congress extended hearings were held before your committee upon a bill introduced by Representative GILLETT carrying out the details of the proposed cooperation between the Government and private interests. This bill was attached to the rivers and harbors appropriation bill in the Senate, but was not agreed to in conference. A new survey was then ordered, which resulted in the report contained in Document No. 417, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, already referred to. It will thus be seen that the Connecticut River project has been the typical case of interrelation between governmental appropriation for navigation and private construction for power purposes.

2. The division officer at the time of the survey in 1909 was then Maj. Harry Taylor, now Gen. Taylor, of the Board of Engineers, to whom I gladly refer you for any details.

3. Document No. 417, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, transmitted by the Secretary of War on December 15, 1915, distinctly recommends the improvement of this stretch of the Connecticut River at a total first cost to the Government of $1,870,000 and $65,000 annually for maintenance and operation, basing the estimate on the construction of the Enfield Lock and Dam by private interests. The district officer recommends that if private interests should not "in a reasonable time construct this lock and dam that the United States should undertake the entire work and lease the power created. On this basis the cost to the United States will be increased to $3,950,000." Adoption of either method by Congress would be acceptable to all interested. I do not need to make further quotations from the report, which is available to your committee and which in all details is favorable to the adoption of the project.

4. At the time the report was submitted the population directly affected was over 200,000. The saving in coal transportation alone would have been from $200,000 to $300,000 per annum. It was computed that 30,000 horsepower could be developed.

5. The need both of the transportation facilities through navigation and the hydroelectric power that could be developed never was greater than at the present time. The section to be served is growing in population and the industrial possibilities would be limited only by the power that could be developed and sold. A channel 12 feet in depth from Hartford to Holyoke would accommodate barges using the Erie Canal and the neighboring waterways from New York, relieving in a very large measure the congested freight shipments so well recognized at the present time.

6. At the last session of the present Congress a general bill passed the House substantially in the form presented by the special committee and would have permitted such a development as the one under consideration. The Senate has previously passed a particular bill for the Connecticut River, so it is submitted for your consideration that the two branches have virtually gone on record in favor of the Connecticut River, but that no positive law has yet been adopted. As a result, the citizens continue to pay unnecessarily high freight rates, traffic is congested, industrial development is delayed, and the water power is not only unavailable for commercial needs, but is absolutely wasted. The Connecticut River is a typical case of the combination of navigation and creation of power. I therefore submit that an initial appropriation should be included in your present bill.

7. Should the committee favorably consider the adoption of the project, it could readily incorporate such conditions as would place the project in harmony with the intent of Congress in the effort to pass the so-called Sims bill. I respectfully submit that the initial appropriation should be made by Congress before it could be expected that private interest should construct the lock and dam. The friends of Connecticut River navigation have waited patiently, but conditions are now so acute that patience in this case does not seem longer to be a virtue. We earnestly ask for inclusion of the project in the present rivers and harbors bill.

8. Attention should be called to the fact that improvement of the Connecticut River above Hartford to Holyoke, a distance of 34 miles, would not only make that stretch available to a large amount of commerce but would increase the use of the river below Hartford to the Sound by that amount of tonnage. The benefit can also be regarded as relieving the freight conditions from the points of loading of the tonnage for the upper Connecticut which would be New York, Perth Amboy, Norfolk, or other ports. The improvement, therefore, would not be affected solely on the stretch from Hartford to Holyoke.

9. I beg to again call attention of the committee to the specific phraseology of Gen. Kingman in his report, to be found on page 3, Document No. 417. He recommends a channel 12 feet deep at mean low water, 100 feet wide, between Hartford and Holyoke, at an estimated cost of $1,870,000 and $65,000 annually thereafter for maintenance. He designates four conditions which must be complied with, having to do with the lock and dam and terminal facilities. Under condition A reference is made to construction of the lock and dam at Enfield in accordance with plans approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War "under the general provision of law applicable to such cases." I submit that the project should be adopted in the present rivers and harbors bill with the initial appropriation, that a reasonable time be given to any interested parties to lay before the Secretary of War such proposition as may be in accordance with statutes, and that he, the Secretary of War, can then pass upon the plans in accordance with statutes and that he, the Secretary of War, can then pass upon the plans in accordance with this condition "under the general provision of law applicable to such cases."

I would ask that the documents already referred to and my testimony before the committee on December 11 be incorporated with this statement as part of your records.

Respectfully submitted.

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 14, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to supplement with a brief statement what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has just said, not for the purpose of clarifying his explanation of this project or of adding anything thereto, but to draw the attention of the House to an inference respecting this project.

This project involves both navigation and the development of water power. It is one of the most attractive propositions of its kind in the United States. As the gentleman says, it traverses a section teeming with industrial plants, with a large population, using very large quantities of coal and other raw products, and producing a large volume of finished products. All of these require transportation, and there can be no doubt that if this part of the river between Hartford and Holyoke were improved, commerce would follow.

As I said, the development of water power is involved here, and I think I may without impropriety state that the committee were not unfavorable to this project, but after some hesitation believed it ought to be postponed until we had some general water-power legislation, such as has been under consideration for so many years in Congress, legislation which would attract capital and protect the public.

This is simply another instance—and that is the main purpose for which I rose to speak—showing the necessity of some general legislation, in order that navigable improvements of this kind involving water power may not be longer delayed, against the public interest.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood the gentleman to say that he considered that this particular project—or rather the committee did—I wish to inquire whether the committee thought it should delay the adoption of this project until general legislation is enacted?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is that the attitude of the committee, in view of the recommendation of the engineer, Gen. Kingman, that this particular project should be adopted, and that such laws as now apply should be complied with by private interests?

Mr. SMALL. I probably should not have discussed in any way the action of the committee, but I thought it fair to say that there was no vital objection to the improvement itself, and that the only reason for delay was the absence of any general legislation.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] has stated. I have made so many speeches on this question that I am not going to take up the time of the House with one now. I began to work for this project when not a Member who is now present was a Member of the House. I hope the project will be adopted when every Member who is now present will still be a Member of the House. I feel, as the gentleman has said, that the one imperative and only necessity for the adoption of this project and its completion, which will add both to the industrial resources of the district and to navigation, is the general water-power legislation to which the gentleman referred, and I sincerely trust that the gentleman and others associated with him on the committee will hasten the passage of that legislation.

Mr. TILSON. In view of the very fair statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], I rise simply to call the attention of the committee to the extreme modesty of the people most vitally affected by this particular legislation.

As stated by the gentleman from North Carolina, this locality already has the commerce; there is no doubt about that; and yet, because there is a water-power proposition tied up with it, we are delaying the furnishing of navigation facilities.

In other parts of the country where there is only speculative commerce, where there is only hope that it will follow the improvement in navigation, we have expended large sums for locks and dams and for otherwise improving rivers and building canals. Here we have the business already. There is no doubt about the commerce that will use the improvement.

I wish to call attention to and emphasize the fact that the people in the Connecticut Valley have been unusually modest in their demands. Private individuals representing the water power at this point for 10 years, to my personal knowledge, have been asking for legislation, either special or general, that would permit them to go on with the water-power development. They have not been permitted by Congress to do so, and now the project that would make this great stream navigable, where the commerce is, is still held up for lack of legislation, lack on our part, on the Government's part, of legislation under which this improvement can be begun as a water-power project. I think I am justified in rising to call attention to the modesty of the demands of our good New England population.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman notes that the lower Connecticut is to be improved in this bill. The project we are now speaking about is for the upper Connecticut. If that should be adopted, would not the lower Connecticut, for which there is an appropriation, be benefited by just that much commerce?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. The lower stretch of river that we have already improved would be used very much more if all the commerce of Holyoke, Chicopee, Springfield, and the other Connecticut River towns of that industrial region should have facilities for water transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Duck Island, Branford, New Haven, Milford, Bridgeport, Southport, Norwalk, Five Mile River, Stamford, and Greenwich Harbors, Westport Harbor and Saugatuck River, breakwaters at New Haven, and Housatonic River, Conn.: For maintenance, $23,000; for improvement of Bridgeport Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 898, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $111,300; for improvement of Norwalk Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1143, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $88,000: Provided, That no part of the latter amount shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall have received satisfactory assurances that local interests will construct such public wharfage facilities as, in his opinion, are required in the interest of commerce; completing improvement of Stamford Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1130, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $183,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement: Provided further, That no part of the latter amount shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall have received satisfactory assurances that local interests will construct a suitable public wharf; completing improvement of Greenwich Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 289, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $35,000; in all, $440,300.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate, after the few recent remarks just made in passing, to question anything in New England, but for fear I may be challenged later on with sectionalism when I oppose one or two other projects and explain them in other parts of the country, I desire to refer incidentally to two or three projects contained in this one paragraph.

Let me read in regard to Bridgeport from the 1918 report of the Army engineers. This is not the project that is reported on by the engineers for this improvement. This improvement is not for the harbor. It is for Johnsons Creek and to reach up to a boat yard away up at the edge and not on the main harbor. Here is what the report of 1918 says, in volume 1:

No estimate is submitted for maintenance during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and it is expected that the completion of the above work, if necessary before the above date, will furnish adequate channels for the accommodation of the commerce of the harbor.

And yet you are asked in this bill to appropriate $111,000 for Bridgeport, Johnsons Boat Landing, away up the creek, that carries several thousand tons.

Let me refer again to Stamford Harbor here. Let me show what they say about Stamford Harbor. I am reading now from page 225 of the Report of the Engineers for 1918, where they reported favorably for the improvement. Here is what they say of it:

No estimate is submitted for maintenance during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, for the reason that the work to be done under the above estimate, if accomplished before that date, will leave the improvement in such condition that no further maintenance will be necessary during the fiscal year 1920.

There is no suggestion in this report but what, so far as present needs are concerned, these improvements are able to accommodate all the commerce.

Now, I have no objection to these projects any more than to many others that are there, but I do say that the Army engineers in 1918 determined that no appropriation for maintenance is necessary. They are not coming in and demanding these new projects. When they say they have enough money for the commerce there in that stream, and that they have enough for the maintenance for present needs, I say that you take it away from the President and from the Secretary of War to pass upon these things and you put it in the hands of the chairman of this committee, who comes to the committee with 70 new projects, and they adopt all that he recommends.

I say that is unfair at a time when we are facing a deficit of $18,000,000,000, when you have got to raise the money for these projects and others by the sale of liberty bonds and by a direct income tax. At such a time I can not see how any man can go to his constituents and justify this expenditure, in view of the report of the engineers.

Awhile ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] said, "You have not given a bill of particulars." He wanted me to make an hour's argument here in two minutes. I can give you project after project, and I ask you to answer if you can. Explain the immediate necessity, if you feel that it exists, some one, excepting those whose districts will receive all the money that is appropriated here for these different projects. New York is interested in what is in this bill. New York has important commerce, and I admit it; but in the substitute bill which I propose to offer for $12,000,000, which is more than the amount added here to the first report of the engineers, New York and everything else that has any real commerce is included.

These new projects are generally not needed and not important at this time. These are the things on which I could comment; I could comment on the Norwalk project in the same way. There are three new projects here. Let me suggest in passing that under this new system this committee embodies a number of projects in one paragraph, and all the projects in one paragraph, involving over $300,000, have got to be discussed in five minutes, if the committee members are technical, which I suppose they will not be.

In the Engineer's Report for 1918 there is no claim of immediate necessity. No one contends that there is immediate necessity for either of these projects, such as under present circumstances would justify this contribution out of the Federal Treasury at this time.

Mr. SMALL and Mr. MERRITT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT.]

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, the report to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has alluded was made by the engineers during war time, and at that time the committee and everyone agreed that even necessary matters might wait. The gentleman has not alluded to the necessity for the improvement of these harbors in Connecticut. As he says, they are all treated together. The reason why they are all treated together, I take it, is that the same reason exists for the improvement of all of them.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. MERRITT. I will; yes.

Mr. FREAR. The report which recommends these improvements was made in 1913. The report from which I read is this year's report of the Army engineers, which says that no money is necessary at this time.

Mr. MERRITT. For the completion of these projects?

Mr. FREAR. For the present projects, or for the use of commerce in the harbor, as I read.

Mr. DEMPSEY. What the gentleman read stated that two harbors out of five do not immediately need a maintenance allowance, but that allowance may be needed during the year for the five as a whole, and the amount is $23,000. That is the report of the engineers.

Mr. MERRITT. I was especially addressing myself to what I think the gentleman refers to, the new projects, and for the information of the committee I should like to point out that all these harbors are really a part of the great New York terminal. It has been shown during the war that the railway facilities for handling coal and merchandise into New England through the port of New York are absolutely inadequate to meet the requirements of commerce, and the physical conditions render it impossible to make those railway facilities equal to those requirements, because all that commerce for New England has to come over the New York & New Haven Railroad from New York. That railroad is already overburdened with passenger traffic, and the freight conditions must be ameliorated in order to help New England. Now, all these harbors need deepening and increasing, so that bulk freight coming into the harbor of New York can be delivered into Connecticut and so distributed through New England without burdening that small railroad throat from New York.

That in brief is the necessity for this increase. A further reason is that the schooners and barges which handle the commerce of New York are being made larger constantly, and where a depth of 9 feet was sufficient a few years ago a depth of 12 feet is necessary now. One member of the committee, who is familiar with that branch, being interested in it, so stated when I was before the committee, and that is the fact.

While this seems local, it helps the national commerce by relieving the port of New York, and by relieving the connection with the whole of New England through New York; and therefore, while in the case of Bridgeport it refers to Johnsons Creek, that is none the less a part of the harbor of Bridgeport, because the requirements of that harbor and of the country in order to meet the facilities of commerce have gone up by leaps and bounds, and this is not by any means a local project, but on the contrary is a New England project, and beyond that a national project, and therefore it is entitled to the support of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would not consume the time of the committee except to point out as an illustration the fallacious argument made by the gentleman from Wisconsin against Stamford Harbor, and I invite the attention of the committee to it. The gentleman read from the annual report substantially to the effect that no recommendation or estimate was submitted, and none was required. The gentleman should know that that extract he read from the annual report referred to existing projects. The bill adopts a new project, and the gentleman deliberately attempts to have the committee believe that the Chief of Engineers has recommended no appropriation for this new project when the committee have deliberately adopted this new project with an appropriation. The annual reports of the Chief of Engineers discuss only existing projects which have heretofore been adopted by Congress.

Now, the gentleman was either ignorant or he was not sincere with the House. I have before me the Report of the Chief of Engineers, House Document No. 1130, Sixty-third Congress, submitted to Congress July 29, 1914, which contains an affirmative and strong recommendation for this project, with an estimate of an appropriation of $183,000, the same amount carried in the bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

East River, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $4,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, who has six new projects in the bill, all added after the bill was first agreed to, and who gets a million dollars for his two canals that have practically no commerce. He says the gentleman from Wisconsin is ignorant or insincere, and I repeat that compliment to him, because he is unfair in urging his own projects.

Let us see. I did not say that it was a question of maintenance of the present projects, and to use his own discourteous terms I say that he deliberately misrepresents my statement. It was not in regard to the present projects, I said.

How shrewdly he dodged the proposition of the first and how quickly he got away from it.

Now, you can deepen a harbor to 35 feet if you want to. It is not a new project, it is not necessary for commerce, and you can not get away from it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Was the gentleman measuring his words when he said that the chairman of the committee had six new projects in the bill after it was completed?

Mr. FREAR. After it was reported by the engineers the first time, and the gentleman from Louisiana has five, almost as many, and he is going to be a very active assistant, and I shall be glad to have him because there is something else that I may want to say in regard to that. The gentleman has five, and will make a very good assistant to the chairman.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I hope I shall in the discussion of the bill before the House.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and the gentleman at the head of a "national" waterways organization also comes from Louisiana, and is a distinguished Member of another legislative body. The vice president of another waterway organization comes from North Carolina, and happens to be the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, this improvement is of vital interest to New York City and to the Nation. I want to do a simple act of justice in connection with this improvement to the Member from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The Hon. Murray Hulbert, formerly a Member of this House, issued a statement in the form of a letter on December 23, 1918, the signature of which is typewritten, but I assume there is no question as to the authenticity of the communication. It contains this statement:

The press, and especially the newspapers, have been very generous in giving me full credit for the humble part I have had in these matters, but this reversal in the treatment of New York Harbor could not have been achieved without the splendid cooperation of Secretary Daniels and Secretary Redfield and the entire New York congressional delegation, of whom Hon. WILLIAM E. CLEARY, my successor on the River and Harbor Committee; Mr. RIORDAN, of New York; Mr. MAHER, of Brooklyn; and Mr. CALDWELL, of Queens, are deserving of special mention.

May I not suggest that a word of commendation for these gentlemen is not only their just due but would doubtless spur them to greater deeds for the future of the port.

The secretary to the commissioner writes as follows:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The commissioner directs me to inclose you herewith a copy of a letter this day sent to the various newspapers, which is self-explanatory.

Yours, very truly,

WM. S. PRINCE,
Secretary to the Commissioner.

I do not speak in any spirit of criticism, but it is only just to other Members of the House that I call the attention of the House to the amendment which was offered in connection with this improvement. On April 9, 1918, at a time when Mr. Hulbert was not a Member of the House, because he had resigned as Member of the House on December 31, 1917, to accept a more lucrative position as commissioner of docks of New York City, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] introduced this amendment:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: After the figures "$2,200,000," on page 2, line 24, add the following: "And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to prosecute the work of improvement, with a view to securing a depth of 40 feet in the channel through East River and Hell Gate as soon as practicable."

I was present on that day in the House when this amendment was under consideration. There were many Members in the House from different States who took an active part in bringing about the adoption of the amendment. Great credit is due to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] and to other Members of the House. The votes pertaining to the adoption of this amendment were fairly close. Upon the motion of the distinguished chairman of the committee that the committee rise, the vote, on division, was ayes 49, noes 58, and the vote on appointment of tellers was ayes 53, noes 59. The vote upon the amendment itself was ayes 62, noes 51. I do not wish to detract any credit from any person in reference to the institution of this great improvement, but I do wish to give credit where credit is due, and my observation and judgment is, and there is not any doubt in my mind about it, and I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of the Members of the House about it, that the adoption of this amendment by the House upon that day was due to the earnest and indefatigable efforts of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], and I want to give him the credit which is his due. [Applause.]

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I want also to give Mr. DEMPSEY great credit for what he did that day. He did lead in this matter, and we supported him. My name appears in the letter which the gentleman from New York has just read. I might say that my own modesty would never have suggested that it appear there. I had nothing to do with it, and knew nothing of it, but while I am on my feet perhaps I might say one word for this bill. Before I do so, I wish again to state that Mr. DEMPSEY is entitled to all credit the gentleman asked for. He is a very fine gentleman, always in favor of these great improvements, and on that day he did lead the fight and we all supported him.

As the New York matter is up it brings various things to my mind. It brings the discussion of the New England coast, and the matters in respect to Connecticut, and so on; and as a man who has had experience in transportation matters for a lifetime, I might say that these projects are good; that they are necessary. The coal all does go up through New York from South Amboy and Elizabethport and Weehawken and these other New Jersey ports, through the terminals, through New York up to New England. We have often carried coal a long distance up the Sound much more cheaply than we did a short distance, because in one place we could load our boats full, had 9 or 10 feet of water, while in such places as Stamford and other places we would perhaps only have 6 or 7 feet of water. We had to have so much money for the trip, so that the places that had little water had to pay the excess freight, which, of course, is unfair and improper. That is one of the things that shows the necessity and the justice of these river and harbor bills. Wherever you see throughout the country great cities have grown up through their commerce, you will find that they are on the water. Take Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston—all of these great cities have grown up because of water transportation. Everyone who has looked up the history of it remembers that the city of New York was third in population and commerce when the Erie Canal was built. It is historically interesting to note that it was George Washington himself who first suggested a great waterway connecting the Lakes with the ocean down through the Hudson River by way of the Mohawk Valley. I might say here a word or two in regard to the great citizen who has just died. I remember appearing before him when he was governor of our State on two different occasions, urging improvement of this Erie Canal. Gov. Roosevelt appointed a committee, the result of whose labors was the improvement and enlargement of the Erie Canal. And we should never lose sight of the fact that he is the same Roosevelt who built the Panama Canal. Everybody recognizes that, and that will go down in history perhaps as his greatest achievement.

He was a great patriot; no one dare deny that. Yet he was a great canal man, and he never hesitated in small things. He wanted to improve them and make large things out of them. So when we can mention such men as Washington, Clinton, and Roosevelt as men who supported water transportation and who dug out harbors and made the cities and the country great because of its water transportation before it had rail transportation, then I think we should be liberal in all of these projects. I would rather make a mistake on the wrong side—that is, I would rather be more liberal and give every American city a good improvement in the way of harbor facilities in the rivers and harbors of the country—than to neglect the water altogether. Our business is here. This country is only very meagerly developed as yet in reality. When we have developed all of these rivers and harbors, built them up, the man who lives 100 years from now will not be able to realize how much has been done in his time, just as it is difficult for us as we look back 100 years. Let us not be niggardly; let us go ahead, and wherever there is a proper proposition, wherever there is a reasonable opportunity to improve the rivers and harbors of the country I want to see them improved, whether they be in Florida, in Massachusetts, or in New York. [Applause.]

It is a great national matter. Of course, New York does not need any talk from me. New York is recognized as the gateway of the Nation. Nobody will condemn the improvement of the harbors there, not even men who hate water transportation. No one will put anything in the way of New York's improvements. All of the Nation uses New York, every section of it, when you go abroad or when you come home, and all transportation, east, west, north, or south. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have a good deal the same attitude of the Irishman who went to Paris. When he came home he was telling his friend of his delightful trip, how he enjoyed the sights and the interchange of conversation with its people. His friend said to him, "Why, what are you talking about? You do not talk French, do you?" "No," he replied, "I do not talk French, but I had with me an interrupter." [Laughter.] Like the Irishman, I feel that I am an interrupter in these proceedings, but at the same time I may in a small measure be an interpreter. I can not let the occasion go by without subscribing to the sentiments of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] relative to the other gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], who in April last, when the rivers and harbors bill was under consideration, succeeded in procuring by amendment authority for a 40-foot Hell Gate channel. I think, however, that tribute is also due to another New York Member, Representative SMITH, and I know Mr. DEMPSEY will agree with me that it was largely through their joint efforts that said authority for the great and necessary New York Harbor improvement was consummated.

To my colleague, Mr. MAGEE, I am pleased to state that before this good day I have placed on record by written word to the mayor of the city of New York the substance of what he has just so well stated of the great work of Mr. DEMPSEY. I believe that I express the opinion of the entire New York City delegation, as well as that of his colleagues throughout the State of New York, who so ably assisted him, in paying a tribute of gratitude for the masterful manner in which he made that accomplishment. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. I will.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. When the gentleman refers to Representative SMITH the gentleman is referring to Representative CHARLES B. SMITH?

Mr. DONOVAN. No; the gentleman is modest. I refer to Representative THOMAS F. SMITH. [Applause.]

I need not urge upon the committee the necessity and demand for the improvement of New York Harbor which the bill under consideration proposes. The port of New York, not only being the largest in this country, but in the world, should have added to its great natural advantages as a waterway and for the handling of its immense tonnage all the mechanical and scientific equipments that can be given.

The appropriation for the removal of Shell Reef, the dredging of Ambrose and Anchorage Channels, and the improvement of Newtown Creek will supply the needed improvements. Better navigation, lessening of congestion, and increase of commerce will then follow.

I would, in fact, be an interrupter if I were to continue longer to detain you with arguments, and therefore I will now conclude. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

New York Harbor, N. Y.: For maintenance of entrance channels and for continuing improvement of Ambrose Channel, Craven Shoal Channel, and Anchorage Channel, $300,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, let me not detract by anything I might say from the eulogies paid my friend Mr. DEMPSEY, a member of the committee, or any other member of the committee who can point to a very large amount or number of projects which he has secured in this bill, or any of the gentlemen who are outside of the committee who have been equally successful. I will say this, that the genial gentleman from New York is entitled to credit, because he certainly worked hard, but I can not conceive why the House of Representatives is paying compliments to this individual and that individual, however well-deserved they are, for their energy in getting projects or getting appropriations. Why, Mr. Chairman, it ought to depend and depend entirely, as I assume it does in New York, on the commercial necessity. Why, that ought to be behind it. I have never questioned appropriations for the commerce of New York, if they were deserving of support, urged by either Mr. DEMPSEY or any other Member on the New York delegation for their rivers. All Members of this House stand together—we all stand together—for waterway improvement. But I do not quite understand that sentiment which would pay a special compliment, except for a Member's arduous labors on this committee and every other committee, to a Member because of the appropriations which come for his community in this bill. I can not understand that method of reasoning, and that is without any criticism of those who have paid the high compliments to my friend. I agree so far as the general speeches are concerned. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question was raised a few moments ago about opening wide the Treasury doors, so as to improve the waterways of the country. Oh, yes, you have; you have given $150,000,000 to the Mississippi River, which has not got a boat line of importance. You have given $24,000,000 to the Missouri River, without a single boat line of any kind, with less than 15,000 tons of commerce last year. You have given seven or eight millions to the Hennepin Canal, which I think had 8,000 tons, including sand, last year; I may be mistaken in the exact freight. Why, you have not any commerce upon the inland waterways, so far as I can recollect, with one or two exceptions. Why, there is no boat line yet upon the $150,000,000 canal of New York State, and if any canal ought to be successful it is that, and I hope it will be. New York has shown its public spirit by paying for it out of its own treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That $150,000,000 is appropriated by the State of New York.

Mr. FREAR. I say New York appropriated for it out of its own treasury. I want to give due credit; you are entitled to it; your State is entitled to it; but the canal is yet a doubtful experiment. I say some of these projects are desirable and worthy—we all know it—in this bill, but many are not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word just to make this suggestion: The gentleman says $150,000,000 has been spent on the Mississippi River and no boats are there. He is not accurate as far as that is concerned. Boats are there, and there is some little commerce, not enough to justify the expenditure of $150,000,000, but this $150,000,000 of which the gentleman speaks has been spent there from the beginning of time down to date. There was a time when part of this money was being appropriated when the Mississippi River was the greatest highway of commerce in the world. There was a time when the commerce of the Mississippi River was 30,000,000 tons annually.

Mr. FREAR rose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Now just wait a second. I just want, not denying what the gentleman said about the totals, to explain it. During those days certainly no man would criticize the appropriations which were then made. They were necessary in order to further commerce and to make it possible. Why, I remember the statement of the president of one of the great barge lines on the Mississippi River to the effect that there were 5,000 wrecks scattered along the banks of that river and in the stream at the time he testified, which was many years ago, caused by snags and bars which had been permitted to accumulate in the river. It was for the purpose of removing those obstructions to commerce that much of the money was appropriated and was justified then by the facts. Now, in recent years appropriations for the Mississippi River have increased and the commerce has decreased, but in fairness it ought to be said that in recent years the large appropriations made for the lower river were not for the purpose largely of improving the river for commerce, but were expended in the interest of flood control, so that whereas we have spent $150,000,000 in many years, I do not know just how many, but since we began these appropriations, and whereas the commerce now on the river is small, it ought to be stated——

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS (continuing). It ought to be stated that while this $150,000,000 was being expended in the years gone by, which was then justifiable on account of the large commerce then upon the river, in later years a large amount of it has been devoted to flood control. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. Is it not a fact before one dollar was ever spent upon the Mississippi River by the Government the commerce was then much larger than it is to-day, that there is not a boat line, not a single boat line, upon the river to-day, and that the $150,000,000 has not developed any commerce——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No.

Mr. FREAR. And was for that purpose, at least according to the statement made upon the floor year after year, until the Flood Control Committee was appointed, of which the gentleman from Mississippi is chairman, and that up to that time it was always said that it was for commerce, and yet we have no commerce appreciably, compared with the enormous expenditures made upon the river?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Now, the gentleman asks a question as to whether or not this, that, or the other is not true. Now, I will answer, Mr. Chairman, in the negative. None of the statement is correct. There is more commerce to-day, very much more, though the river carries very little, than there was before the Government of the United States ever made any appropriations for the river. There are boat lines now on the river, a number of them. I have not looked into the engineers' report this year, but I take it that the commerce from Baton Rouge—and I think that is the point at which they divide it—south would show something like a million tons. When considering the commerce on the river it is difficult to avoid duplication. The reason I said from Baton Rouge south is because there can not be any duplication there. But there are many hundreds of thousands of tons of freight more. There are many boat lines on the Mississippi River to-day and local and through barge lines.

The third point, as I recall now, is that these appropriations, until I became chairman of the Flood Control Committee, were always predicated on the theory that the money was spent for the purpose of developing the commerce on the river. That is not the fact. The act of Congress which created the Mississippi River Commission in 1881 particularly and specifically states it is for the control of floods as well as for navigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be allowed to proceed for two minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The fact that all the engineers agree that there was but one way to improve the river for navigation, and that was the identical method by which it was necessary to improve it for the purpose of flood protection, was frequently stated in answer to the suggestion by Members of Congress that Congress had no constitutional warrant for making the appropriation. That is all. The arguments were always made that here was a great enterprise, so great in its area, so great in its possibilities for benefits to the whole people, that it did, in fact, involve the general welfare of the people, that it justified appropriations being made by Congress, $1 being given by Congress where the local interests put up $3. Now, these facts, I think, ought to be submitted in fairness, in view of the criticism in the statement of the gentleman that $150,000,000 had been spent without securing any commerce. The $150,000,000 does not go in this bill. Nothing is carried in this bill for the lower Mississippi from Cairo down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. I wanted to ask what was the total average of the commerce on the Mississippi River last year?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not know. The chairman of the committee can state it, probably. I imagine that the commerce on the lower Mississippi perhaps ran, if you could eliminate the duplications, probably around 1,000,000 tons. That is merely a guess.

Mr. GARD. I wanted to know whether there was a severance between the amount said to be appropriated for navigation purposes and the amount for flood-control purposes on the Mississippi River.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The flood-control act passed a few years ago contemplated an improvement on the Mississippi River below Cairo by the Mississippi River Commission, and the jurisdiction of that commission extends to the entire subject of flood control and navigation. I will state that perhaps $1,000,000 will be about the amount spent annually—perhaps not quite that much—directly in the interest of navigation, without reference to flood control, and the other would be spent for the construction of levees and revetments, both in the interest of navigation and of flood control. Now, that is about, approximately, the situation.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. In the appropriations made for flood control would not some of that money be spent in deepening and widening the channel in order to control the water?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. If so, it would not be necessary to appropriate money in the river and harbor bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No. There is no appropriation carried in this bill for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Newtown Creek, N. Y.: For improvement of Newtown Creek and tributaries in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 936, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $205,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement.

Mr. CLEARY and Mr. FREAR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is recognized.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman who has just spoken, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], chairman of the Flood Control Committee, was a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for many years, and a very active member. This House, in its wisdom, passed a bill giving $45,000,000 from the Treasury toward work on the lower Mississippi on condition that the people along the lower river gave one-third as much, if I remember correctly the condition made in the bill. I can speak from positive knowledge of portions of the Mississippi River when I say that on the upper Mississippi, with practically $30,000,000 expenditure—and that was for the purpose of improving navigation—the commerce to-day amounts to practically nothing in view of the enormous expenditure made; that the engineers figured, in order to get their commerce, the cost of automobiles ferried across the river, and added over $40,000,000 to it last year for automobiles ferried across the river. They do not have the item in it now, but they put in sand and logs floated down the river.

Mr. GARD. To what does the gentleman attribute the condition of the commerce?

Mr. FREAR. To the railroads, largely. The Government to-day is endeavoring to test it out by building boats and barges, because private investment will not do it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman advise the House how they float sand and gravel down the river?

Mr. FREAR. I will state that I went down the Mississippi from St. Paul to St. Louis, and paid my own fare, for the purpose of seeing how the commerce on the Mississippi River, which I had heard spoken of frequently on this floor, really existed. For 300 miles we never passed a freight boat on the Mississippi River—and that was three years ago—until we passed a barge of sand, and you have practically 6 feet of water there in the river at all times of the year.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Did you meet any?

Mr. FREAR. Nothing except Government boats. These were everywhere, carrying materials for the improvement of the river, and not a single boat carrying commerce, unless it was an excursion boat. But we met this sand. I put these facts in the RECORD at the time when I made the trip.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi has been a very faithful and ardent supporter of these matters. No appropriation has ever been too large to excite his attention. He has been satisfied. I have no criticism to pass upon him. He has been very kind to me at times when I criticized these matters. But I do want to say that the $150,000,000 spent on the Mississippi was ostensibly expended for commerce, and you have not any commerce to speak of. I have tried to find out where it is on the lower river by reading page after page. There is a little commerce below. But one port in our State has over 50,000,000 tons, and the gentleman takes a great deal of satisfaction because, after an expenditure of $150,000,000, you have got possibly a million tons.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman will be fair enough to state that the $150,000,000 has been expended in the past 80 or 90 years?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; for a long period.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And during that time there has been tremendous commerce on the river?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I agree that before a single dollar was ever expended they had 130 boats on the upper river, but there is not a single boat there now. We spent $30,000,000 on the upper river, and we have had commerce there in the past; but now the commerce is almost completely wiped out, except for these proposed Government barge lines. Last year we gave $3,600,000 to Mr. Goltra, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, for barges built by the Government. We are still building them.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. You say "we." Who does "we" mean?

Mr. FREAR. I mean the Government—one of the so-called war boards—for the purpose of carrying ore from St. Paul to St. Louis.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Have conditions developed in the Mississippi River similar to those in Long Island Sound with respect to the railroads?

Mr. FREAR. I can not be interrupted for that. You must take your own time. The conditions are very different. In the Mississippi you can have only a limited depth. Beyond that the water is not there to fill the river, any more than in the Missouri or in the Cumberland or in the Ouachita. There is no commerce there. The railroads take it away.

Mr. CALDWELL. Did the railroads drive out the boats?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; frequently they have driven the boats out of business. That is a matter of public knowledge.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, the last item read was "Newtown Creek." Inasmuch as it is called a "creek" I thought perhaps I ought to explain it to some Members present who may not know the facts.

Newtown Creek is only a portion of the East River, running up between the Borough of Queens and the Borough of Brooklyn. It has a tremendous business, which runs into the millions of tons. There are tremendous factories there, and there is a tremendous commerce on it. I want you to know it is not an ordinary creek. It is simply a great slip, a part of East River, in Brooklyn, built up for the advantage of the people so that they can get their water business up into the heart of the city of Brooklyn. That is what Newtown Creek is.

Now, while I am on my feet I want to call attention to another feature of this water transportation, which was suggested by a gentleman who said something about it, that even where a railroad does parallel a water line and where as the result of the use of that railroad, which gets most of its money out of passenger traffic, and so on, it is able by its large capital for the time being to reduce the tonnage of that river to a small percentage, all the same in the judgment of the people of those localities, the industries that have been built up, the country that has been developed by the simple existence of that river, justifies the improvements that were put on it, if it never carried another pound. I want you to remember that. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is a great deal more popular to throw bouquets and compliments at one another here in this committee than it is to stand up and oppose the bill. It is not popular to oppose a river and harbor bill. If the engineer's report to the committee that $11,750,500 for waterway expenditures for this year is sufficient for all purposes, with a balance of $45,000,000 on hand, then under what reasoning do we propose to go to work and propose to spend $27,000,000? Why do we do that when the engineers, who have authority and whose judgment should govern appropriations, say $11,000,000 is enough?

I was in hopes that we could hold down the appropriations to the amount asked for this year by the engineers. I think under existing circumstances it would be far more popular to do that than to spend $27,000,000 in the face of the conditions that confront the Treasury of the United States. We are exacting every dollar we can get from the people by taxation, and we are trying to expend it in the most economical way that we can; and to propose to expend $27,000,000 for waterway improvements at this time, when the engineers say $11,000,000 is enough, requires a considerable nerve to override the engineers' recommendation and estimate.

Now, we hear a great deal of rates being regulated by waterway improvements. I have been on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for a number of years, and I have seen a great many millions of dollars expended for waterway improvements, but I would like to know who will contend that the ultimate consumer gets any benefit whatever from these improvements? We hear a great deal of talk about how coal is transported on water, and how the people are benefited by such transportation of coal because they can get a cheaper rate by water than they can by railroads. Does anybody believe that they can buy a pound or a ton of coal any cheaper, whether the coal is transported on water or by rail?

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an answer to his question?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. I will say I know of one case. The Delaware & Hudson Railroad monopolizes the carrying of all the coal in northern New York, and it runs partly up into New England. I was for many years vice president of the Lake Champlain Transportation Co. We used to deliver coal parallel to the Delaware & Hudson Railroad right up into Vermont, and we sold coal right straight along for a dollar a ton less than the railroads. Coal in the village of Whitehall was continually $1 a ton less than it was in Fairhaven, 20 miles away, and the farmers used to haul it from there in sleighs in order to get the benefit of the dollar a ton difference in the price. The railroad had a regular rate. The canal had no rate. It carried it the cheapest it could.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That was some time ago, was it not?

Mr. CLEARY. Up to five or six years ago. I have not been in that business since then.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I have been buying some coal since then.

Mr. CLEARY. I do not mean the last year, during war time.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Everybody who has to buy a ton of coal knows that the price of coal is regulated at the mines.

Mr. CLEARY. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLAGHER. It is regulated by transportation.

Mr. CLEARY. By transportation; yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. And the small dealer in coal who sells you a ton of coal below the regulated price is put out of business.

Mr. CLEARY. That is governmental.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is the way they are doing business now, and you are proposing to spend millions to open up water transportation for coal, when the price is regulated to the consumer.

Mr. CLEARY. It can only be lowered by water competition.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The consumer can not buy it unless he pays the price put upon it by the manipulators in the market.

Mr. CLEARY. That has only been during the war. I have been cutting the price of coal all my life, and selling it here and there for whatever we could get for it, and selling it more cheaply because of the water transportation lines.

Mr. GALLAGHER. It is known by everybody who has to buy coal that the price is regulated. So it is with other commodities. After we have spent millions of dollars in opening up creeks and rivers for the improvement of water transportation, everybody knows that we can not buy anything a dollar or a cent cheaper than the regulated price.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY] spoke about the Erie Canal, and what a great benefit it is. The State of New York has spent millions of dollars to develop the Erie Canal, but where are the boats? They have got no boats on the Erie Canal, and there is no transportation on the Erie Canal.

Mr. CLEARY. That is not true.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Not any to speak of.

Mr. CLEARY. The Erie Canal was only finished this year.

Mr. GALLAGHER. But one of the alarming conditions about the Erie Canal is that after it was finished they found they had no boats for it.

Mr. CLEARY. They had to build new ones, but they will come on, just as the rivers produce the commerce when they are deepened.

Mr. WHEELER. There have been about $24,000,000 expended on the Missouri River. How much benefit have the people received in the way of decreased freight rates there?

Mr. GALLAGHER. They have not received any benefit, and there is no boat line on the Missouri River.

Mr. SNYDER. I should like to say a word about the Erie Canal. I live on the Erie Canal, and the gentleman is absolutely correct about there being no boats on it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They have made no preparation for boats for it.

Mr. SNYDER. The Government has been operating that canal for the past year, and I have ridden up and down beside it 40 or 50 miles day after day during the summer, and nine times out of ten I never saw a boat on it. A year ago I suggested here how easy it would be for the Government to arrange it so that we could get some benefit out of it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is the condition practically of nearly all these rivers. There are no boats on them. Here is the Missouri River, on which we have spent millions, more than $20,000,000 in all, and a short time ago they were going to put a boat line on the Missouri River. There is an appropriation of $400,000 in this bill for the Missouri River, and not a boat on it, and no possible chance for a boat to be operated on it.

Mr. SNYDER. Thirty years ago all of our coal was carried by canal, and many times in those days we received our coal at a cost of not to exceed $2 a ton on the yard. This year, by reason of no boat transportation and several other reasons, I received the coal on my yard inventoried at $7 a ton.

Mr. CLEARY. By reason of no boat transportation—the best possible argument in favor of boat transportation.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The trouble with the Erie Canal, like the trouble with the rivers, is that there are no boats on them. We have been pouring millions of dollars into these waterways to make them ready for transportation, and there are no boats.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not true that the owners of the boats that were on the Missouri River disposed of them to the Government, so that there are no boats there to-day?

Mr. GALLAGHER. They sold them out to get rid of them, because they were unprofitable.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not true that the Railroad Administration have fixed the rates on the Erie Canal, and other water-transportation lines, so high that nobody will use them?

Mr. GALLAGHER. There are no boats on the Erie Canal.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some kind of a malignant feeling about the Missouri River, and I wish to notify the Chair that I would be grateful if gentlemen would discuss the paragraph under consideration, in accordance with the rules of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. A gentleman asked me about the Missouri River, and I want to tell him about it. There is an appropriation of $400,000 in this bill for the Missouri River, and there is not a boat line on the river, and no prospect of a boat line. I asked the engineer, "What are you going to do with the $400,000 appropriation for the Missouri River?" He said: "The soldiers are coming home, and there is great need for opportunity to put men to work. You can use it very nicely by putting men to work." "For what purpose?" "To improve the river." Yes; and there are no boats on the Missouri River.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman say that there is no boat line on that river?

Mr. GALLAGHER. There was one; but it was unprofitable to the Kansas City people, who put up the money for that boat line, and they were glad to sell it and get rid of it.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is assuming part of that. The Government recently took possession of a great many profitable businesses.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They were very glad to get rid of the boats, a great many people that had stock in the company.

Mr. RUCKER. When the Government gets through improving the Missouri River I want the gentleman to come there and ride down that majestic river, and then he will change his mind about it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I have been up and down that river.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time be extended five minutes and that he be given at least one minute of that time for himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I just want to quote from the Engineer's report to show that the boats were laid up for the winter and that the boats were there then. That was before the Government took them. We have spent $24,000,000, as shown by the report, and after deducting the sand, the commerce was less than $15,000.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, the whole question resolves itself into this: The people are paying taxes and the Government is trying in every direction to get money to pay our war bills, and now, notwithstanding these enormous amounts that we have to raise, we propose to spend a number of million dollars for the improvement of rivers where there are no boats and no commerce to speak of. I have been on the committee for years, and we have been making appropriations every year for the improvement of rivers. But there are no boats on any of the rivers worth speaking about, and we are simply throwing the money into the rivers and into the creeks without getting any return for the people's money. Now, if we would take the millions that we are spending on rivers and creeks and put that money into good roads, does anybody doubt that that money would bring great returns to the farmers and everybody else? They could not control the farmers coming to town with produce; they could not control the traffic on the highways, and we would get some benefit from the money put in good roads that we now put into rivers and into creeks. We put the money into waterways where there is no attempt by the people along the rivers to make any provision for harbors. How are you going to tie up boats where there are no harbors? If there were boat lines or prospective boat lines, I would be in favor of improving the rivers. If there were boat lines I would be in favor of appropriating this money, but that is not the case. Why should we spend enormous amounts of the people's money in the improvement of rivers every year where there is no commerce. I am opposed to it. I am in favor of improving every harbor where there is commerce to justify it. I do not find any fault with the improvement of the harbors of New York or Boston, or any great port where they make provision for commerce, but I do object to the present bill in the face of the report of engineers, and I say it is not fair to the public to expend millions where we do not get a cent of return.

Mr. WHEELER. As I understand, the committee recommended $15,000,000 more than was recommended.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think the engineers reported a recommendation of $15,000,000 and said it could be reduced to about $11,000,000, and the bill carries $27,000,000.

Mr. DUPRÉ. When was the Engineer's report made up and sent to the Congress?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I can only tell when it reached the committee.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman knows when the annual report is made up, does he not?

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; when I am called upon to act on the report of the engineers is when it is presented to the committee.

Mr. DUPRÉ. If the gentleman does not know about the law and the practice in that respect, that is all right.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I know all about the engineer's report and when it was presented to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL was recognized.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, we are not discussing any amendment to the bill, the amendment is a pro forma one. I ask unanimous consent that after the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] concludes that we proceed with the reading of the bill. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want time?

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to answer the argument in regard to the rates on coal. I am willing to do it on the next paragraph.

Mr. SMALL. Very well; Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and paragraph close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Newark Bay, N. J.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 2110, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $105,600.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER], who just addressed the committee, made the assertion that the waterways of the country were of no benefit in the transportation of coal, and indeed he took the stand that the waterways of the country were declining in the matter of transportation everywhere. The district that I have the honor to represent has bordering it and adjoining it two navigable streams—the Allegheny and the Monongahela. The Government has expended approximately $6,000,000 on the Monongahela River and has installed therein 15 locks and dams and carried slack-water navigation from Pittsburgh to the city of Fairmont, in the State of West Virginia. The average freight on coal within 40 miles radius of the city of Pittsburgh by rail is 40 cents per ton, and it has been that for the last 10 years. The average freight by water transportation, not for 40 miles but for 80 miles within a radius of the city of Pittsburgh, which is the great consuming coal market of western Pennsylvania, is 18 cents per ton, and as proof of the fact that industrial interests that are available and accessible to this slack-water navigation make use of it as a means of carrying coal let me read to you from the lock master's report of Lock and Dam No. 3 in my district to show the amount of coal the industries and consumers of coal generally take by water, because they can purchase it at lower rates, and in order to show that the rivers are not declining in their commerce. I may say parenthetically that when the Government took this system of navigation on the Monongahela over in 1887 the entire traffic of coal, freight, merchandise, and miscellaneous freight was less than 5,000,000 tons. In 1913 12,000,000 tons of freight passed through this lock and 43,598 passengers on passenger boats. In 1914 there were 37,092 passengers and 10,374,000 tons of freight. There was a decrease there because we were coming into the war.

In 1915 there were 27,800 passengers and 11,816,000 tons of freight; in 1916, 32,513 passengers and 12,876,000 tons of freight; while in 1917 the latest available statistics say there were 23,078 passengers and 16,900,000 tons of freight. This freight, according to the lock master's report, was made up as follows: Coal, 76 per cent; coke, 2 per cent; building material, sand, gravel, and so forth, 12 per cent; waste from our furnaces, 7 per cent; miscellaneous 2 per cent; showing that the river traffic, at least in western Pennsylvania is not only increasing in volume and value, but is a positive benefit to our manufacturing industries, and that coal is procured there at so much less per ton that our industries and consumers of coal resort to and use this navigable stream in order to procure fuel.

Talk about river traffic declining! Listen to this: The lockages upstream in this lock—and I give it because it is in my district—were 5,720 in 1917, and the lockages downstream were 6,045. The steamboat lockages upstream were 4,398 and downstream 4,369. As further evidence of this important river traffic and of its constant, continuous, and great increase, let me cite the number of barges that these boats tow. The upstream lockage was 21,000 and the downstream lockage 21,046. When a gentleman gets up on the floor of this House and asserts that we are wasting money on these improvements and that the people receive no benefit from them he is talking either without accurate information or the district that he represents does not avail itself of what the Government is endeavoring to make available for its benefit. Western Pennsylvania has no greater improvement, no greater stimulus to the great industrial center of Pittsburgh, than its water transportation, bringing cheap coal, cheap transportation, cheap raw material to the furnaces and forges of that great industrial center and workshop of the world, the city of Pittsburgh. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR rose.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who last spoke selected the one project in the United States—the inland waterway that is not a ship canal—that is known as a success, and that is the only one, so far as I know, unless he calls the Ohio River a success, which, with $59,000,000 of expenditure, has an average traffic of only a few miles; but a gentleman from Pennsylvania, not far distant from the gentleman who has spoken, suggested to me that I look at the other locks and see what is doing there. I hold in my hand page 2989 of the Engineers' Report, the last one, and of the 15 locks only those that are down near the mouth are the ones that carry commerce. The upper ones average four and five thousand tons, and so on, and they have cost an immense amount of money. I got the suggestion from a gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he says he knows the condition thereof.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does the gentleman deny the statistics that I have given as to Lock No. 3?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman has taken the statistics of the lower locks, of course, but on the river itself——

Mr. ROBBINS. I took only one lock.

Mr. FREAR. I have got them all here.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not care; the commerce there will be developed, just as it has been developed in pools Nos. 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Illinois told the fact and called attention to the decrease. Here are nine locks where there is an infinitesimal commerce to-day. It is only near the mouth where commerce is important. The Monongahela is known as a peculiar river, because it has coal close to the place of manufacture, and it resembles in that particular the Rhine River in Germany, which is practically the only river over there which is a success. The gentleman from Illinois in making his comparison of the Mississippi and the Missouri and the Cumberland and the Tennessee, the conditions are as he states, and in North Carolina and in the lower reach of one of the rivers, of course, the traffic does exist, but it is practically the only river which has been cited——

Mr. WHEELER. Is not there a canal to Philadelphia supposed to haul coal to Philadelphia?

Mr. FREAR. I do not know——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That shows how carefully gentlemen study river and harbor matters.

Mr. FREAR. I do not know to what the gentleman refers. That is all I care to say about this, except that the Monongahela, because of its peculiar situation, with the mines close by and the great industrial center of Pittsburgh, is a success, but it is not a success on the rivers generally. The gentleman from Illinois stated the fact, I believe, correctly, as can be evidenced by the statistics. On the Monongahela, I believe, it is only near the mouth where they use it, according to the figures I have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Keyport and Shoal Harbors, Woodbridge, Cheesequake, Matawan, and Compton Creeks, Elizabeth, Raritan, South, and Shrewsbury Rivers, and Raritan Bay, N. J.: For maintenance, $15,000; for improvement of Raritan River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1341, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $250,000; for improvement of Shrewsbury River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1296, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $100,000; in all, $365,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to make a statement. Mr. Chairman, may I say to the committee that we are exceedingly anxious to conclude this bill to-day, and if gentlemen will confine their remarks to the paragraph under consideration and will not make pro forma amendments, for the purpose of discussing extraneous matters or matters not involved in the paragraph under consideration, we will save a great deal of time. There is no purpose on the part of the committee to curtail discussion or bona fide criticism of the bill or any inquiries for information.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. And I would be glad if we could make some substantial progress. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor. He yielded to me for the purpose of making a statement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SMALL. If I have the time.

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I only want five minutes to speak on another matter, which I believe is very important, something I very seldom do, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. SMALL. Well, the gentleman can make his request to the House when the gentleman from Wisconsin has concluded.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is the Raritan River, which carries a quarter of a million dollars in this new project, on page 5 of the bill. The gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, took me to task a little while ago because I read the last Engineers' Report, which is old. I read the report of 1918, of the conditions there to-day. Page 360 of the Report of the Army Engineers of 1918:

Proposed operation. The balance available will be expended in maintenance dredging.

There is a small balance they have there, and there has been an appropriation for this work.

Channels of the present completed width will conveniently accommodate present and reasonably prospective commerce.

That is the Engineers' Report of this year:

It is accordingly not proposed, at the present time, to prosecute the project for its completion.

They will not complete the project, and yet we have a proposition facing us when the engineers say they have enough money, that the harbor will accommodate present commerce, we have $250,000 for a new project coming in here. Let me take up another. The Shrewsbury project. There are two or three others I want to speak of incidentally as I am passing. The Shrewsbury: How much is added here? A hundred thousand dollars. I do not know but what there is more, but that is all that appears in the bill here. Now, let me read from page 375:

The funds available will be expended for maintenance, dredging of shoals at the Highlands Bridge, in Reeves Channel, and in the Upper and Lower Crossovers, provided a suitable contract can be secured.

It is proposed to expend the fund appropriated by the river and harbor act of July 18, 1918 ($10,000) for maintenance dredging by contract where needed in any part of the river covered by the project.

Now, remember, $100,000 in this bill, in addition to $2,805,000 that has already been expended, and a gentleman, a member of the committee, within my hearing says that they have got fine commerce there now. Let me tell you what they have: 411,000 tons in 1917, 95,000 tons last year, a failure of over 80 per cent of reasonable tonnage, and you are asked for another new project on an 80 per cent loss showing.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. What is the value?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, its value. They do not ask anything more; they do not need anything more, and yet with a loss of 80 per cent in their commerce there is added another project to this bill, and you are going to tax the American people and sell liberty bonds for that purpose.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, while I was home Christmas a neighbor of mine informed me that she had received a letter from a comrade of her husband in the Marine Corps informing her that her husband had been killed. She telegraphed the Navy Department, but received no reply. At her own expense she cabled the chaplain of the regiment, the company commander, and tried for a month and a half to get some word concerning her husband, but was unable to get any replies to her cables. Finally, just at Christmas she received this letter from the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

It is addressed to Mrs. Catherine Euphrasia O'Donoghue, 270 West Eleventh Street, New York City. It says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, December 21, 1918.

In re: #2,186,969. O'Donoghue, Michael Thomas, MCR, MB. Paris Island, S. C.

Mrs. CATHERINE EUPHRASIA O'DONOGHUE,
270 West Eleventh Street, New York, N. Y.

MADAM: The award of $30 per month granted in your favor on the application of the above-named enlisted man was paid up to and including October 31, 1918, but as this man died October 4, 1918, there resulted an overpayment of $26, which amount you will please refund immediately.

This refund should be made by money order or draft, drawn to the order of the Treasurer of the United States, and mailed to the Office of Receipts and Disbursements, Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Washington, D. C., with this letter or a copy thereof.

Respectfully,

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, ACCOUNTS.
By W. DU R.

Form #2002
Feb. 5/19.

This is a regular shyster-style demand for a refund made upon a poor woman, and the first official notification from her Government that she received of the death of her husband. To my mind, a most disgraceful procedure. Gentlemen, hostilities have ceased for over a month and a half, and there is no reason why these records are not in shape and why the people of this country can not have timely and complete information concerning their boys.

Here is my reply to the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and I ask that the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 30, 1918.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: In reference to your letter of December 21, in re No. 2186969, O'Donoghue, Michael Thomas, Marine Corps Regiment, Marine Barracks, Paris Island, S. C., marked "5 A. D., 104/sw, Form #2002, Feb. 5/19," signed Deputy Commissioner, Accounts, by W. du R., addressed to Mrs. Catherine Euphrasia O'Donoghue, 270 West Eleventh Street, New York City, you are informed that I have instructed Mrs. O'Donoghue to ignore that letter and all similar communications from your bureau. You will hereafter communicate in this matter direct with me.

You will inform me at once who is the author of this crudely drawn, shyster-style form letter. You will also inform me at once why it is that an overpayment of this nature is not debited to the account of the insurance and taken out of the final payment when it is made.

I want an immediate reply from you, inasmuch as I shall take this matter up in the House.

Very truly, yours, FIORELLA H. LAGUARDIA.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No reply as yet has been received by me from the bureau.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Was the boy killed in action?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; killed in action, or died of wounds received in action. He was a marine.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For just a question. I have something more to say.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman can get more time. First, I want it understood that I do not approve of this character of letter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Which one? Mine or the department's?

Mr. McKENZIE. The one that was written to the widow.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Thank you.

Mr. McKENZIE. But I do think in the interest of truth we ought to get the facts before the House and the country. What I want to ask you is whether or not under the law that the Congress enacted some time ago this widow would not be entitled to compensation under that law from the date of the death of the soldier, and whether or not, if she received allotment pay after the death of the soldier, and then entitled to compensation, she would not be getting double pay?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is true. My reply was, as I stated in the letter, that there is insurance coming to this widow and compensation coming to her. Now, with all the clerks that we have, with all the officers that we have, and all the bookkeepers that we have, they can at least debit that account with $26, and when they pay the widow the insurance deduct that amount and not write a letter of that kind.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman know that the compensation, allotment, and insurance features are all kept separate, and that no one department can keep everything of that sort?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not care. If it is wrong, let us fix it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the fault is in the Congress, then your letter is not justified.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not care where the blame is; we must correct it. Surely a system of credit and debit between these departments can easily be established. I do not believe legislation is necessary for that—common sense and ordinary intelligence is all that is required. What I want to make clear is that I do not want to blame any department. If it is up to us, let us get together and do it; but I do not see that there is a tendency here to do those things.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. We passed a sloppy bill yesterday with the pretense of taking care of honest claims. We passed a bill by which every dishonest profiteer and crooked money grabber can catch onto the wagon and get his bills paid. And the tendency is keeping on.

If a Congressman goes to a petty officer of the Army he is treated with arrogance and impertinence. Now, there is no reason why we can not take matters in our own hands, and it is up to us to do it. If we do not do it, there is no use of complaining about the attitude of the departments.

Mr. DUPRÉ. If they treat brother officers in that way, what does the gentleman think of the way they treat ordinary civilians who have never been in uniform? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just think of it! I can imagine. The gentleman has my sympathy.

The War Department has issued a circular, known as Circular No. 77, in which they stated the policy by which they would discharge certain classes of men, and yet when an application is made and the man is squarely within the requirements of that circular the answer comes back that "the services of the man can not be spared." I had a case where a boy is detailed to selling tickets for the Long Island Railway, and they told me that his services could not be spared, and yet he is a former employee of that railway, and if he were discharged he would be placed in exactly the same position where he is now as a soldier—except, of course, the railway company for whom he is selling tickets would necessarily have to pay him and not the United States Government.

Mr. KEARNS. And get more money, too.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course.

I introduced a resolution yesterday authorizing the employment of civilians in all positions of a clerical nature or where it is just purely manual labor and not of a strictly military nature. It will cost the Government less than it does under the present system of maintaining ten soldiers to do one man's work.

If you consider the pay of a soldier, his food, his clothing, the cost of administration, and the overhead charges, we can employ men in the localities where the services are needed at the standard wages for such services and save money, besides discharging thousands of men who are now involuntarily kept in the Army away from their families and their usual productive pursuits. The resolution has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I sincerely hope it will not be kept there until the war is over, or until demobilization is complete—in about two years from now, at the rate we are going.

But, gentlemen, these men can be spared. We can get every soldier in Europe back. I will tell you how to begin demobilization and actually produce results. Take every officer of the Army and put him back to his original rank in the Regular Army and you will see how quickly demobilization will start. There is no need of that army in Europe. There is no need of that army in Russia. Their duty is completed; it has been gloriously performed. The thing to do is to get the men back as quickly as we can and to demobilize the troops that we have here now. The purpose of our National Army has been served and there is no reason for the continuance of this large number of men in the Army.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it not because all these regular officers have been elevated in rank and hold commissions with larger salaries? Is not that the reason why they do not want the demobilization?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Put them back into the Regular Army at their regular rank. Why, there are mere lads out of West Point but a few years holding the rank of lieutenant colonel. And as for generals, there are hundreds of them. Take the Aviation Service—all Regulars holding high ranks and very few of them flying across the lines; it was the civilian soldiers who did that.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I know of a lieutenant colonel who, with his friends, is doing the best he can to get out of the service, and he can not do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is he in the Regular Army?

Mr. SNYDER. He is in the National Army and serving as adjutant of a division. Everything under heaven has been done to get him out, even offering to pay his transportation home, and they will not let him come.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly. They want to keep a large establishment over there. No large Army; no high ranks. We must take the matter in hand and compel prompt return of our troops from overseas and immediate demobilization at home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HASKELL. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to some correspondence which I have here, in brief two letters, in which it is charged that Maj. T. M. Lynch, of the Quartermaster Corps, died of pneumonia in the Walter Reed Hospital through neglect.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I want to know if this appertains to this bill or not?

Mr. HASKELL. Oh, no.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then I object to it.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman from Maryland is too late.

Mr. HASKELL. This correspondence makes the charge that Maj. T. M. Lynch, of the Quartermaster Corps, died of pneumonia in Walter Reed Hospital because of neglect and inhuman treatment, and I ask that these letters be read for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York has the right to have them read.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will not do that.

Mr. HASKELL. I will read them myself.

Mr. MADDEN. It will take more time if you object to this than by letting it go.

Mr. LINTHICUM. My only object is to get through with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland withdraws the objection. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, December 27, 1918.

Congressman HASKELL,
Care Continental Hotel, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HASKELL: I am taking the liberty of sending you herewith copy of my letter to Mr. William A. Graham, Chief of the General Supplies Division of the Quartermaster Corps, in which department my brother and associate member of my company, Maj. T. M. Lynch, worked for the past seven months in the position of chief of the administrative branch.

The facts mentioned in the inclosed letter all came under my personal attention at the Walter Reed Hospital, where my brother died solely because of lack of attention and inhuman treatment—the same kind of inhuman treatment, I have since learned, is existing throughout various other hospitals on this side.

I have also since learned, from first-hand evidence of physicians and laymen, who have recounted to me their personal experiences, that they have seen instances almost without end that were even much worse than that mentioned in my letter to Mr. Graham.

I sincerely hope that you can and will take such measures as you deem best to throw the light of publicity on these conditions, and thus minimize, at least, the terrific loss of life that is being needlessly wasted daily, but which fact is being kept hidden from the public.

Nothing can be done, naturally, to bring back my brother to his wife and family; but I would feel that I was remiss in my own personal duty if I omitted taking this step in asking your good offices to try and prevent a continuous recurrence of such catastrophes among not only those who are at the present time in these hospitals, but also those who, in all likelihood, will be accorded similar incompetent treatment for the future if something is not done to change the situation.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPH J. LYNCH.

NEW YORK, December 23, 1918.

MR. WILLIAM A. GRAHAM,
Chief General Supplies Division, Quartermaster Corps,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GRAHAM: Permit me to express, in behalf of Maj. Lynch's wife, his mother, and myself, our sincere appreciation of the courtesy and service rendered his immediate family subsequent to his death, as well as for the representation the division accorded him at his funeral.

We all feel very kindly toward you and the division. Likewise did my brother, whose almost last conscious thought was given to the handling of his work and how best to administrate the duties intrusted to him. He had no idea whatsoever that he was going to die, and his mind was almost continuously given to the work needing his immediate attention.

I am very sorry indeed, however, and if I were to permit myself to give free rein to expression I am afraid I might say something with reference to the medical attention given my brother which would not look well in type. I had a five months' experience last winter with a very virulent pneumonia case of my youngest son, and consequently am a little qualified to pass judgment on the methods of treating pneumonia cases. I had, in all, 8 physicians and 16 nurses ranging over these five months, not to mention a number of specialists. There is hardly a phase of the case which I have not studied, because it meant a matter of life and death with my son, and I left nothing undone, from a human agency standpoint, to bring him back to health, which, with God's help, was accomplished.

The surrounding conditions in which I found my brother on my arrival at the hospital absolutely forbade his recovery. In the first place I am not at all in sympathy with the allopath treatment of pneumonia cases. Their record of "cures" is so terrifically low on a percentage basis when compared with the homeopathic treatment thereof as to leave no doubt in anyone's mind (other than an allopath) of how very abortive are their ideas and how dogmatic they uniformly are in adhering to them in spite of the terrific loss of life accruing from their treatment.

Nothing, of course, can be done to bring back my brother and business associate to me or to his wife or his mother: that is all past. But I would like to, in some measure, at least, try to help, if possible, to remedy the situation for the poor devils that have to undergo such treatment as I saw given my brother on my arrival at the hospital.

Under the plea of, "he needs fresh air," my brother's cot was placed on a screened piazza, and, while the folding doors on this piazza were both open and the temperature very low, a window back of his cot was also open, permitting a terrific draft over his bed. Moreover, insufficient clothing was on the cot, with the consequence that the vitality needed to offset the effect of the pneumonia disease itself had to necessarily be dissipated in counteracting the effect of the terrifically cold draft blowing over his bed from the open window. My wife and I called the nurse's attention to this condition immediately on arriving at his bedside. No justification was attempted for such a condition, as no justification was permissible.

Notwithstanding the fact that I had previously telephoned the officer of the day or the adjutant (Maj. Roberts) offering to bring on two or three nurses from New York with me on the 3.30 Congressional Limited, he told me that he had plenty of nurses and did not need them. I found to be the fact that two nurses only were employed in ward No. 21, where my brother was located, and these two nurses were supposed to look after all the patients in that entire building—a physical as well as mentally impossible task for them to do and render service to any given case like my brother's.

By feeing the nurses and getting them interested in my brother's case, I succeeded in getting an additional special nurse for the remaining few hours of his existence—too late, however, to undo what had gone before.

Toward the end I asked permission to have oxygen administered to my brother, and Capt. Durgin, who was on night physician duty, told me I would have to take this up with the chief. He admitted that the chief was not on duty at night and would not be there until the next day. He suggested, however, I take it up with the captain on the desk at the "entrance" section of the hospital—I believe his name is Haxes—which I did, with the result that he also claimed having no authority to even suggest, let alone request, Capt. Durgin to use some oxygen, and, of course, did nothing. An hour or two later my brother died.

In connection with the handling of pneumonia cases I was further shocked to learn from Capt. Durgin, as well as the nurses, that trips to the ward were made but once every three or four hours, if then, hardly a method of medical procedure that will give any assurance whatsoever of successful results, particularly in the treatment of pneumonia cases wherein the heart becomes such a vital factor, needing close, immediate attention continuously.

Further, one of the nurses admitted frankly that even in a case of necessity they were supposed not to notify or call the physician or to make any suggestions regarding a patient's condition, which would warrant an additional visit of the physician; in other words, medical attention was to be given at the specific periods of the three to four hour interval visits and at no other time. You can imagine my feelings in the matter when I learned this phase of the "treatment."

The whole hospital "treatment" from the start to the finish is absolutely the most incompetent and inhuman I have ever seen or experienced and among my many business clients I have numbered quite a few representative hospitals, and I know whereof I speak.

The foregoing incidents are but a few of the things that I encountered during my comparatively brief stay at my brother's bedside. One further illustration of the obvious incompetency that exists throughout was evidenced to me before I even left New York. I telephoned the officer of the day, or the adjutant, and I had to be very insistent in my statements that my brother was registered at their hospital and, in reality, compel them to go and look it up three different times before they were in position to verify my statement as being correct—hardly what one might term an "efficient" method of administration, particularly so in reference to cases like pneumonia that need continuous, close, personal contact and supervision if the patient, whoever he may be, is to get any show whatsoever for his life.

I am very sorry, indeed, that such a situation as this should have eventuated, not only for my brother's and his family's sake but also for yours. I don't want you to think for one moment that I have any feelings whatsoever toward any other than the hospital administration. I admit frankly, however, that the hospital phase of the matter is one concerning which I have very strong opinions—opinions which are irrefutable because they are backed by indisputable facts, knowledge, and experience that can not be gainsaid by anyone. I only hope that my bringing this matter to your attention may in some way alleviate the condition for those who may have the ill fate to follow Maj. Thomas M. Lynch.

It certainly has been a terrific shock to me to realize, as I have in this case, at least, how apparently unappreciative the Government is of the personal sacrifices, superhuman effort, and work rendered it by men like my brother, whose only fault is that ultraconscientiousness in sticking too long to their task at the expense of their health. For any man, whether be he officer or private, to be accorded the "treatment" mentioned in the foregoing paragraphs of this letter is, in my opinion, a stain upon our Government's glorious record in this war—a stain which I am loath to believe it would willingly permit to continue.

Sincerely,

J. J. LYNCH.

P. S.—I have about decided to bring this matter up for congressional action. I would feel personally responsible otherwise for the murder of others who may follow my brother and be accorded similar "treatment."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Delaware River, Pa., N. J., and Del.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, to the sea, $2,500,000; completing improvement at Camden, N. J., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1120, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $71,080; in all, $2,571,080.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I speak on this item because it is somewhat different; it is not a new project; it is not an old project, but it is an important one, so far as commerce is concerned. I wish to call attention to a phase of this item as it was presented to the committee. On page 9 of the committee book report submitted by the Army engineers is an item of $500,000 for this project. That is for the Delaware River from Philadelphia to the sea, and $400,000 on the Schuylkill. As the bill stands to-day it carries $2,500,000, or five times as much for the Delaware River, and $1,000,000, or more than double, for the Schuylkill.

I have spoken about the conditions to-day, which it seems to me call for some reasonable attempt at economy, and, referring to page 391 of the record, I find that there was available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, for this Delaware River $2,916,123, or almost $5,500,000 that will be carried by this proposition, counting this balance on hand, if we vote this $2,500,000, which I expect the House will do. I refer to page 389 and read from the report of the engineers for 1918:

Owing to the inability to secure advantageous contracts, the balance remaining on hand (of $2,900,000) is larger than was anticipated. It is estimated that the sum of $500,000, in addition to the funds now available, can be profitably expended during the fiscal year 1920 in continuing the required maintenance and new work under existing projects.

And yet, although the engineers only asked for $500,000, with $2,900,000 on hand, the committee is adding $2,500,000 in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to concede that we are not at war and that the engineers' report for $500,000 may have been founded on that basis; but the conditions of the Treasury are no different. We are going to raise the funds in the same way that we would have raised them then.

And if the Army engineers at that time thought it sufficient, with $2,900,000 on hand, to add $500,000 more, it seems to me that the committee, in adding $2,000,000 to that amount, is largely burdening this bill with a very big item.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. In just a moment. Now, I realize that this is a large port. I realize that the gentleman from Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, who is a very industrious and eloquent Member, is very anxious about this, and that other Members are; but let me say, it is the largest one item that has been added in this bill, and with the Schuylkill River, adding $600,000 to that, although they have expended only some $1,500, I think so far, it is $2,500,000 added to this bill over the report made by the engineers to the committee, as shown by the books of the committee.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to ask the gentleman if he has read page 25 of the hearings, where Gen. Taylor, who represented the Chief of Engineers, himself suggested this increase?

Mr. FREAR. I have no doubt you can get the engineers to suggest anything; but here is the report made by the Chief of Engineers, and that is the report that is official, and he says that $500,000, in addition to the $2,500,000, is all that is necessary. Yet the committee has added $2,000,000, making about $5,500,000 for the Delaware River. Now, I suggest that this is a different kind of an item, and as it appeared here I thought it was proper to present to the House at this time in order to show the significance of such methods of preparation of the bill. Of course, you can say it is important, but I can not understand how, with that large amount of money on hand, more than has ever been held on hand for that river before, this large appropriation is added.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I think it proper, just after the gentleman from Wisconsin has concluded, to read from the hearings. It has been suggested that possibly the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has not attended all the meetings of the committee; but I want to say that he has been very attentive in his presence. But possibly he does not recall, or may not want to recall, some of the things that took place there. I read from page 25 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. The next is Delaware River, from Philadelphia to the sea, for which $500,000 is submitted as an estimate for further improvement. Is that all that can profitably be used during the next year on that great river?

Gen. TAYLOR. I think not, sir, under the existing conditions. The original estimate by the district engineer was $2,500,000, but in view of the conditions that existed at the time the estimate was submitted to Congress—

That is when we were at war—

we cut this down to $500,000. With changed conditions, with the armistice having been signed and the probabilities of additional plant becoming available in the near future, I would recommend that that be put back to the original amount—$2,500,000.

So spoke Gen. Taylor, assistant to the Chief of Engineers. That is all I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think we are ready to have the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Schuylkill River, Pa.: Continuing improvement, $1,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I just want to call the attention of the House to the answer, and the only answer, that has been made here—that after the Chief of Engineers and the Army board have passed upon this item and have recommended the amount of $500,000 the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee, according to the hearings, says:

Is that all that can profitably be used during the next year on that great river?

And with that invitation Gen. Taylor said, "Oh, as long as the war is over, we can put in the full amount," and to the $500,000 is added $2,000,000. That one statement of Gen. Taylor is allowed to set aside not only the views of Members as to public economy but the view of the Board of Engineers, according to the reports sent here for our guidance.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Referring to the Schuylkill River, which has just been referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin, I think it is proper to proceed in the way that I have before and to call attention to the difference between the gentleman from Wisconsin and the Chief of Engineers, or his representative, and to the difference between the gentleman and the record as made up in the committee. I read from the hearings, at page 26:

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is Schuylkill River. The estimate there is $400,000. Have you any modification?

Now, the gentleman said that the chairman of the committee had extended an invitation to Gen. Taylor, which he evidently accepted. Personally, I resent that imputation on Gen. Taylor; but I will read Gen. Taylor's reply:

Gen. TAYLOR. I recommend that that be increased to $1,000,000. That estimate of $400,000 was submitted under the same conditions exactly as the Delaware River, when we were doubtful about being able to get dredges, and we put in the minimum that we could get along with, and we now think we will be able to obtain dredges, and that is a very important project.

And he goes on to state what the project is. I just mention that for the benefit of the House, to show how the Committee on Rivers and Harbors acted in making up this bill, which seems to have aroused so much of the opposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, much of the foreign and domestic commerce that comes into and goes out of the Delaware River arises on the Schuylkill. That is a very important branch of the Delaware River. It is unquestionably one of the largest oil-shipping ports in the United States. Just for the information of the House, before this item is passed, I wish to say that the reports of the engineers show that the value of foreign exports from these rivers last year was $501,000,000. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that the port of Philadelphia, of which the Schuylkill River is a part, has come to be the second port of the United States. I do not say that with a view of arousing contention, but that is the fact. Upon the Delaware River, in the vicinity of the Schuylkill River, we have very many shipyards upon which the Government is now dependent. There are on the Delaware River, from Trenton down to Wilmington and below, 27 shipyards at the present time. There are 9 docks and 179 shipbuilding ways. At these yards are employed 80,000 men. The revenue collected by the Government at the customhouse in Philadelphia for the port of Philadelphia for the past year is a little more than $14,000,000. That was due to the fact that our exports were heavier than our imports, and to other conditions which I need not explain at the present time. Prior to 1913 it was usual for the port of Philadelphia to collect from the shipping that came into that port for the revenue of this Government as high as $21,000,000. It has fallen off during the war because of the difference between the imports and exports and the laws. I mention the fact, however, to show that while Congress is proposing to appropriate $2,500,000 to build a project that has not been worked upon during the war, and $1,000,000 toward bringing the Schuylkill up to date, the Government of the United States is getting its appropriation back tenfold, and that is one of the methods by which the revenue of the Government is raised. I am aware that some gentlemen say that that is not a fair contention, but I assume that if the waterway is working and bringing revenue to the Government it is mighty good investment on the part of the Government to spend probably 5 or 10 per cent in order to get that revenue.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania about the port of Philadelphia, I want to have read in my time an editorial from the Baltimore American of December 16, 1918, which may enlighten the gentleman from Pennsylvania and some others as to the port of Philadelphia.

The Clerk read as follows:

A BIT OF PORT NEWS.

According to a statement in the Philadelphia Ledger, Maj. Gen. Goethals told Mayor Smith, of Philadelphia, a few days ago that the Government will discontinue the use of Philadelphia as a port for handling Army supplies, as likewise Boston and Newport News, and that all such shipments hereafter will be made from New York, Baltimore, and Charleston. The reason given by Gen. Goethals to the Philadelphia mayor for discontinuing the use of that port is that experience has shown that the cost of handling Army supplies for shipment from Philadelphia and Boston is greater than the corresponding cost as pertaining to Baltimore and New York.

The Quartermaster's Department has, by actual tests, proven what was apparent on the face of things, namely, that Baltimore has an advantage in interior connections and developed harbor facilities which constitute an economic advantage in the handling of export trade. The statement made to the Philadelphia mayor by the quartermaster general will doubtless be a very cold douch for Quakertown, for there has been much talk recently in shipping circles along the Delaware about making the Delaware River port a hot rival to New York in respect to foreign commerce.

Generally speaking, seaports are born and not made. Baltimore, we believe, is one of the born world ports. It has a harbor layout upon a grand scale equaled by few other ports, excelled by none. And it has three systems of dockage terminals functioning in connection with three extensive railroad systems. It is not to be overlooked that the Western Maryland is in alliance with the New York Central system and that the shortest port connection for that system for interior business is at Baltimore.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cooper, Salem, Cohansey, and Maurice Rivers, Woodbury, Mantua, Raccoon, Oldmans, and Alloway Creeks, N. J.: Completing improvement of Raccoon Creek in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 800, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $39,770.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. No one rejoices more than I do that Baltimore has come to the front. [Laughter.] It is a growing city and extremely popular for a while. It will continue to be popular in Washington and elsewhere until the end of the wet season. [Laughter.] This may account to a certain extent for the exuberance of the editorial writer from whom my friend from Maryland has quoted. All the editorial writer has said is not exactly in accordance with the facts. We glory in Philadelphia, now that we occupy the second place amongst the ports of the United States, in the gradual advancement that is being made by our neighbor. We have been working hand in hand so far as we could, except occasionally we have found by reason of the activity of Baltimore's mayor and the energy of Baltimore's Congressmen that they have slipped a few things over on us. [Laughter.]

It is a good thing to have this sort of rivalry along the coast. It is not pleasant to find an Army officer permitting himself to be quoted in favor of one port against another, because if we consult the Constitution of the United States we find that no one port is permitted to have a preference over any other port. Natural conditions prevail to the advantage of some ports, and social conditions, as in the case of Baltimore, sometimes give an undue advantage to a city.

But the fact is, Mr. Chairman, the controversy between Gen. Goethals and the mayor of Philadelphia, referred to by the Baltimore editor, is not fairly stated. There has been a controversy between the mayor, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of War because of certain conditions in Philadelphia due to an overflow from the city of Baltimore. [Laughter.] What prevails at Baltimore seems to be sweeping over into Philadelphia, with the result that the mayor has been obliged to take the matter up with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and in the due course of time the responsibility will be fixed and the invasion will be suppressed. [Laughter.]

But I wish at this time to take advantage of a part of my five minutes to say that I have certain communications from Gen. Goethals and others in respect to the controversy which I would like to put in the RECORD, as they completely refute the statement of the editor that Baltimore has taken the second place from Philadelphia. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Philadelphia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, there is a very pleasant rivalry between Philadelphia and Baltimore, and Baltimoreans love Philadelphia just the same as the Philadelphians love Baltimore. When it comes to the question of particular facilities and cheapness of transportation from Baltimore with the Central West, Baltimore has it all over Philadelphia. As to the hospitality and the wet goods of Baltimore at this time, I want to say that we do sell squirrel whisky, which makes a fellow jump around a little, but we do not sell, as they do in Philadelphia, a brand called Eagle whisky, which makes him fairly fly.

The Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy told the mayor of Philadelphia that if he did not clean up a little he would have to do it for him. I think that is the matter the gentleman refers to. The Secretary of War or the Navy has never had to tell Baltimoreans that we keep clean.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I was willing to submit to two interjections by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] because a few moments ago he raised the point that we were not discussing the particular project, and I wanted to see how far afield he was willing to go.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have been discussing port facilities.

Mr. FREAR. The port of Philadelphia is not in controversy.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield, so that I may make a request?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Very well; make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the interesting part of the discussion by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] and also by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in regard to Schuylkill River is of no avail, because I made no suggestion about the Schuylkill. I was discussing the Delaware River, and they both jumped to the Schuylkill immediately. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] rightly says that Philadelphia has a large item of $14,000,000 which is received every year and goes into the Government Treasury. That is a large amount of money, but they have some large shipyards down there. That is also true; but the gentleman fails to tell us that there is to be taken from the Government Treasury over $34,000,000 to make up a shortage in the Hog Island shipyard proposition that no one can explain, and that is right in sight of Philadelphia, so that this money in the Treasury can not all be used for carrying on this waterway, when we have to pay for a shortage in the Treasury that comes from that immediate neighborhood.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is going a little afield.

Mr. FREAR. I will yield later, but I want to get back now to Raccoon Creek.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman has made a charge.

Mr. FREAR. I know; and the gentleman can answer it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no time, because the time has been fixed.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I object to being interrupted, because I have not the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I shall have to take some time.

Mr. FREAR. Why, certainly that is all right. I would not make any charge at all that I would not want the gentleman to answer if he can. I am now referring to Raccoon Creek. Raccoon Creek is an important proposition. It gets $39,000 in this bill. It has lost over 80 per cent of its commerce within four years, and half of that important commerce was manure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is going out to Wisconsin to fertilize the land out there.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no; we do not need it. We grow things without it there. Page 5 of the report says that the traffic of the stream is carried by gasoline boats and barges, and by one steamboat plying daily between Bridgeport and Philadelphia; but before that let me throw a little light on this Philadelphia situation. In the Washington Star of January 3 there is a reference to a Government investigation of alleged discrimination against Philadelphia as a port for overseas trade and for disembarkation of troops, and we find it reported that Philadelphia and Boston alone of all of the principal ports in the country have not been represented upon the shipping control committee of the United States Shipping Board, notwithstanding such representation has been earnestly urged, and that neither of these ports has received what it believes to be its proper allotment of Government overseas trade. In other words, the disembarkation of troops must await until Philadelphia has been given its fair proportion and Baltimore its fair proportion with Boston and New York. Oh, no; that is not the purpose, and if that is the suggestion in this report it is a mistake. But let us get back to Raccoon Creek. There is reported a small tonnage, with drafts between 4 and 6 feet. The traffic of the stream is carried by gasoline boats and barges and by an occasional steam tug. A greater width at bottom than 40 feet would be impracticable, it is said, without endangering the stability of the banks. On page 7 of the report I read:

The stream is tortuous in its course, but can not be advantageously straightened by cutting off points or shortened by making cut-offs, because the meadows along the banks have been protected by levees and have been reclaimed to a greater extent than on any other stream in the district. Instead of the worthless marsh land usually acquired for cut-offs valuable farm lands would be destroyed and the price would be out of proportion to the benefit expected.

Mr. Chairman, here is little Raccoon Creek, and the committee has put this in for $39,000, in addition to all the money that has been spent on the creek, which lost 80 per cent of its commerce during the last four years. That is a proposition added to this bill by the committee.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], I want to say that Raccoon Creek, I suppose, would be spoken of as a river in his district, because it is a large stream. It carries one of the largest volumes of commerce of any tributary of the Delaware River. The Board of Engineers in 1913 reported that there was an average daily tonnage of about 4,923 tons; that in 1912 the commerce amounted to 92,688 short tons, valued at $1,163,700. There are 21 landings and wharves used, and I think 34 boats ply the stream. The farmers use it almost entirely to ship their products to Philadelphia, Chester, Wilmington, and Baltimore. There is more farm produce shipped from the city of Swedesboro, on this creek, than from any other one point in the State of New Jersey. Produce also goes to New York and Boston, but that freight goes by rail.

This provision is for a jetty at the mouth of the creek; it has been highly recommended by the Board of Engineers and it was in a river and harbor bill which passed this House and died in the Senate. I am surprised that the gentleman makes this attack upon an item for the improvement of a creek which is doing business for the benefit of the farmers in south Jersey.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that there is only one railroad running down to serve this farming country?

Mr. BROWNING. There is but one.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that if this stream were not open so that the farmers could get to it by boat they would have to pay the highest possible freight rates?

Mr. BROWNING. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that if they had to do that the price of living would go up to all of those who purchase these food products?

Mr. BROWNING. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why did the Lord ever arrange that the Delaware River should have tributaries so that the farmers could get to it? Can the gentleman answer that?

Mr. BROWNING. I do not know.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cold Spring and Absecon Inlets, Absecon and Tuckerton Creeks, and Toms River, N. J.: For maintenance, $20,000.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "Absecon Inlets," in line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa moves to amend page 6, line 6, by striking out the words "Absecon Inlets."

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors refused to allow an estimate for maintenance of $30,000 for Absecon Inlet. Now, under this policy of grouping projects in a district for maintenance of projects the engineers could use any or all of this $20,000 at Absecon Inlet. It seems to me that to carry out the intention of the committee these words should be stricken out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa will not prevail. The gentleman who represents the district in which this inlet is, Mr. BACHARACH, has been called away by illness. I know that he sincerely desires that this item shall stand as written, and as it is for maintenance I see no reason why it should not stand. Absecon Inlet is an inlet at Atlantic City, N. J., the great coast playground of the world, and efforts have been made there for years to establish boat lines, and they have been established, and they were running up until the war. Efforts to establish a 12-foot channel were made, and were successfully made. That channel is outside where the sea sweeps back and forth and tides flow, and it is very difficult to maintain it. Any gentleman who has been to Atlantic City and gone up to the inlet and out on one of the pleasure craft will understand the difficulties of this proposition. There is a harbor there, and there is every reason why commerce should be encouraged to go there. There is no other way to get there except by rail, and that is very expensive in these times. To strike out this item and leave Cold Spring Harbor in would simply mean to cut out Atlantic City.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Does the gentleman think the Government is justified in spending $40,000 a year there, which it has been doing for four or five years?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The item is for the maintenance of Cold Spring, Absecon Inlet, Absecon and Tuckerton Creeks, and Toms River, N. J., not for Absecon alone.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I am not asking to strike out the appropriation; I am asking to strike out the words "Absecon Inlet," because there is no commerce there that requires continuing the work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There is no commerce; there are no steamboats. It is a channel made by a sea-going dredge. The dredge is the only boat to be seen in the channel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know steamboats were running from Philadelphia into Atlantic City——

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. When?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some time before the war.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There have been no steamboats there for two years. We are spending $40,000 per year wearing out a dredge and getting absolutely no returns in the way of commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That substantiates my statement.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I call attention to this fact——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If I mistake not, because I have not followed this matter closely, I saw it announced recently that a steamboat line had been started by some business men to connect with New York.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. If that is true the dredge could be put in commission again, but there is no occasion for doing work there at present. It has developed no commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a large appropriation has been made for Pollock Rip Shoals, out in the open sea, which the gentleman and I both supported and which the committee approved, where the sea sweeps back and forth and where there is a possibility always that maintenance will have to be provided.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; but there are millions of tons of commerce passing through Pollock Rip Channel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true, and I approve the appropriation and would fight for it, because I believe it to be necessary; but the geographical conditions are substantially the same as to the ebb and flow of the tide and the possibility of filling in the channel. Why, you might as well say that a house would keep clean forever without sweeping as to say that an inlet that the sea breaks over back and forth would keep open without assistance.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. If there is any commerce that is using it now, the engineers do not know it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are hundreds of boats at Atlantic City using this inlet——

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon, that is not the case. I was over there a year ago last spring and I talked with fishermen and also with the people working on this dredge, and they said there was absolutely no use for that channel except for the sailboat that took people from Atlantic City out over the bar and back.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] hands me a report showing that in 1914 there was an increase in commerce at this point from 27,500 tons in 1913 to 30,500 tons, so why close it up, why stop business that has just started after this vast expenditure?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The commerce that they have there does not use the channel the dredge is maintaining.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman again calls attention to the value, showing that the commerce advanced from $1,700,000 to $1,800,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps there is no difference between the gentleman from Iowa and myself. It is only a question of how such mutual purpose shall best be carried out. What the gentleman has in mind, as I understand, is to provide that no part of this $20,000 shall be spent on Absecon Inlet; but I do not think that ought to be accomplished by striking out "Absecon Inlet" from the bill, because there is available, or was on July 1, 1918, $20,000. The words "Absecon Inlet" may remain in the bill. I will ask the gentleman if this proviso, which I will read, would not accomplish the purpose he has in mind: Strike out the period at the end of line 8, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be expended on Absecon Inlet."

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That it the purpose I seek to accomplish. I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. No; I accept the amendment to my amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask whether that does not contemplate the abandonment of the maintenance at that point?

Mr. SMALL. I will say to the gentleman, pending the reading of the amendment, that Absecon Inlet has been discussed by the committee a great many times. The original improvement was taken up as an experiment, and with the assurance that the commercial interests of Atlantic City and other localities would see that a commerce was established between Atlantic City by water and other points. There is no such commerce to and from Atlantic City through the inlet.

The commerce is confined to small fishing boats and pleasure boats, and for their purposes it is not necessary to maintain a deeper channel than would exist naturally.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That involves commerce, as I stated, and it involves the saving of life.

Mr. SMALL. There is no need of any further improvement for these pleasure boats or these fishing boats. There was a steamer placed in service at one time between Atlantic City and New York, I think, but that service has been withdrawn for some time. And my understanding is that there is at present no commerce by steamboat of any size between Atlantic City and any other point.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman what becomes of the dredge?

Mr. SMALL. The demand for dredges is so great it can be used in other improvements.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has not been working there for some time.

Mr. SMALL. That is probably true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the inlet been going back?

Mr. SMALL. Up to this time the project depth has been maintained, and will be so long as the available funds will permit. The committee concluded that the existing commerce did not justify further appropriations. Under the general provisions of the law the dredge formerly used on this project may be diverted for other improvements.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in view of the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, which serves the purpose I have in mind, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 8, strike out the period at the end of line 8, insert a colon, and the following:

"Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be expended on Absecon Inlet."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appoquinimink, Smyrna, Leipsic, Little, St. Jones, Murderkill, Mispillion, and Broadkill Rivers, Del.: For maintenance, $10,000; for improvement of Mispillion River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 678, Sixty-second Congress, second session, except that part of said improvement known as Cut-off No. 2, which is hereby eliminated from said project, $70,400: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $80,400.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In addition to $219,000 or more that has been spent upon this little creek, or river, as it may be called, the Mispillion, this bill carries $70,400. Let me say in reply to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], who talked just a few minutes ago, and who questioned whether or not we had a transportation waterway out there, that the greatest river in the world passes by my district, and I think most of the money spent on it has been wasted. We have a port that carries 52,000,000 tons, or practically twice what Philadelphia carried last year.

But I want to address myself, if I may, to the Mispillion River.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. My rising, Mr. Chairman, seems to be a signal for interruptions. I trust I am not, intentionally, at any rate, intruding on any of these projects belonging to the gentleman, but I want to talk about the Mispillion River now.

The district officer presents a project for the improvement of the Mispillion River. Understand that this project was in the 1914 bill, which was defeated. Now it is up here again. It was the same kind of a project. It has not changed at all, and it is not improved at all, but we have lost 40 per cent of the commerce we had at that time.

I am reading from page 4:

The improvement now desired and needed is the making of a number of cut-offs in the river to shorten the distance between Milford and Delaware Bay, the elimination of some sharp bends, and the increase in depth across the flats to 6 feet at mean low water to conform to the project depth in the river—

And so on. And then down further it says:

The Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad passes through the town and shares with the river the transportation of the town and vicinity.

Of course, the suggestion was made that the railroads are held down in their prices by the waterways. That is not so, unless you have a railroad commission that will hold them down to a reasonable expense. Why should the Government be continuously putting money in there on the theory that it is going to affect freight rates? That was once a common argument, but it has been exploded now, Mr. Chairman, and it is not indulged in in these debates, and particularly it is not indulged in by the Army engineers, who now make their recommendations on a different basis.

I am reading from page 4 again. I read:

There are no public wharves on the Mispillion, but all the private wharves are free to those who wish to use them, and space along the river bank is too abundant to permit of any monopolizing of the terminal facilities.

Notwithstanding this money that has been expended—over $200,000—there is not a public wharf on that stream yet; and in order to shorten the distance up to Medford—that is the purpose here—for these people who do not contribute a nickel toward this project, we are asked to give $70,000 more, in addition to the $200,000, to be derived from the sale of liberty bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inland waterway from Delaware River to Chesapeake Bay, Del. and Md.: For improvement to a depth of 12 feet at mean low water, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 196, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $3,000,000: Provided, That of the foregoing amount so much as shall be necessary, not to exceed $2,514,289.70, may be paid for the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and all the property, rights of property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 7, strike out the words "the purchase of" at the end of line 7.

Mr. SMALL. I will explain the purpose of this amendment. Condemnation proceedings are now pending for the acquirement of this property, and they were pending when the agreement was made, about a month ago, as to the purchase price of the property. It is quite probable, in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers and the Department of Justice, that it may transpire that the best way to obtain title so as to quiet any outstanding claims would be to have the condemnation proceedings continue in a friendly way to an award and final judgment; and that being true, the words "for the purchase of" ought to be stricken out, so that it will read "may be paid for the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the effect of the gentleman's amendment be to leave open the condemnation proceedings in the event there should still be any differences between the Government and the owner?

Mr. SMALL. It leaves it entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of War, to acquire it either by purchase and the execution of proper instruments or by pursuing the condemnation proceedings, as may be deemed desirable.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, there will be two strings to the bow?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I would not pass over this item in this quiet way, but——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman intends to debate the item?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very glad to hear it. We did not expect the gentleman to pass over it.

Mr. FREAR. And the House would be indebted to the gentleman from Philadelphia without a motion on my part to strike out the last word. I hold in my hand Document 196. That is of the Sixty-third Congress, first session. This is for $3,000,000 for a bankrupt canal. That is only for the first payment. You are going to have $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 or possibly $20,000,000 to pay for a 13-mile canal, 25 feet deep or over, to connect the Chesapeake with the Delaware River. It will eventually amount to that.

Col. Bixby recommends the Raritan, running across New Jersey. That is to cost $45,000,000 if you put it at a 25-foot depth. That is in the same document as the one in which he recommends the 13-mile canal we are now discussing.

Mr. Chairman, we have had this project before us for many years. When it was originally built the Government put $450,000 into that canal. Now the Government is to buy it outright, to spend $3,000,000 in this bill, and possibly $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 eventually to get the deep channel that they want in order to connect Philadelphia with Baltimore. They will come in here with the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy to show why it is needed for naval protection, so that our great battleships can run in and out, so that no hostile vessel can come across the seas and catch them. [Laughter.] It is needed also, it is said, for the transportation for troops at the rate of 4 miles an hour, in order that the troops may be transported from Washington to Baltimore. That is from the engineers.

There is a little commerce there, a small commerce; but for this $3,000,000 you will assess the people of the Hawaiian Islands and compel them in part to pay, and the people of Sandusky and the people of every harbor out in the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and say they shall pay half or a large contribution toward the improvement of their projects.

Why do we say, "We will give to Pennsylvania and Baltimore $3,000,000 in this bill and follow it up with an unlimited amount—any amount you choose to put in, depending on the width of the canal and the depth" without asking for contribution?

Mr. Chairman, I have moved to strike out this item many times. It is no better and no worse than many other items. But my distinguished friend here from Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, with his eloquence can almost convince a man against his will concerning the merits of a proposition, and no doubt he will do it with respect to this. The Government paid $450,000 originally, and now when the company is bankrupt, when the bonds are worth only 68 cents on the dollar and the stocks are valueless—and the stocks and bonds are all practically held by the city of Philadelphia—we are to buy it. I do not care to discuss or to criticize it any more. I have done so time and time again, many times. As my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] once said, it is to take the seasickness out of the sea in going from Baltimore to Philadelphia, a delightful trip to take. [Laughter.] Of course, lives have been lost in going from Baltimore to Philadelphia by water, but Christopher Columbus in a comparatively small boat crossed the ocean several times. He was never afraid, and yet we must have a 13-mile canal between Baltimore and Philadelphia in order to make them more accessible to each other. The people over there want it. The people who own the stocks and bonds of this company want it. But I feel that they should make some contribution first of all.

Now, we are going to have the proposition elucidated with more eloquence by the gentleman from Pennsylvania than by anyone else who could attempt it. He has brought out a map illustrating the course of the canal. I suggest this to the gentleman, that all the while he is speaking on this subject the people who are to pay for this are the people not only of my State but the people of every State in the Union, and we will have to buy liberty bonds to build this Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, and we are now facing $18,000,000,000 indebtedness in order to buy this canal and meet other expenses. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I intend to give the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] the surprise of his life. He has been so generous in his adulation of this project that I feel that I ought not to take up the time of the House to answer him. [Applause and laughter.] To be sure, there have been one or two misstatements; I will not be so severe on the gentleman as the chairman of the committee is at times, because they love each other in the House and in committee; but several of the gentleman's statements are so utterly at variance with the—I will not say that [laughter]; but some things that the gentleman said so lack knowledge and information that I feel I would like to extend my remarks on this subject. I ask unanimous consent to do so. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman is so eloquent, so full of facts, so full of oratory, and so full of jokes, and that the subject matter of his speech is so well portrayed on the map that tears are dropping down from the clouds on certain parts of the map. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The map speaks for itself.

Mr. MADDEN. And it cries to itself. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. I am inclined to object to the request for an extension of remarks on the part of the gentleman, and insist that his remarks be uttered on the floor. I do not like to have gentlemen make these speeches under cover, so I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be given 15 minutes in which to utter his remarks, so that we can hear what he says instead of having them hidden away in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say that a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still. I feel that I ought not to say anything on this subject, important though it be.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman knows that I come from Pennsylvania and that I have served in public bodies up there. We have always been pretty liberal up there to encourage many enterprises. This, I understand, is what is called a "pork-barrel bill," is it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Such bills have been so called. I think the gentleman has been in error about the facts sometimes.

Mr. FOCHT. I am very liberal by my vote, and I do not want to have any conscientious scruples. I should just like to know what Pennsylvania is getting out of this. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If you will listen to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] you will find that we are getting more than $6,000,000 for "the vicinity of Philadelphia." I do not quite agree with him, because I believe every one of these projects to be national projects.

Mr. FOCHT. Since allegations are being made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] that Pennsylvania is being taken care of to that extent, I think possibly I will be able to arrange matters with my conscience and vote for the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I welcome the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] into the fold. We are gradually making converts for a worthy cause, and the longer we stay here and the more persistent we are the more friends we have and the more meritorious does our cause become.

Mr. FOCHT. Do you not think that some other Members might make a similar acknowledgment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think so.

Mr. FOCHT. And that possibly some of their enthusiasm is inspired by the pork coming into their immediate neighborhood?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Wisconsin has been so self-sacrificing regarding his own territory and so condemnatory of his own rivers that sometimes I think it might be well for other Members to praise theirs.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object to this Pennsylvania colloquy. There are other States represented here besides Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Illinois is always welcome in a controversy of this kind, and New York likewise.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman seems to be carrying out his first idea, of not saying anything about this project.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the fact, owing to these interruptions. The gentleman is as lucid as usual.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I appreciate the compliment of being invited to say something on this subject. It is one very dear to me, and one in which I have come to believe thoroughly. The agitation to accomplish this great work has extended over the period of my entire term in Congress. I believe it to be of national moment, or I would not stand here advocating it.

Much has been said about the extravagant expenditures of the Government at the present time. River and harbor bills have been inveighed against because of the allegation of "pork." No one has contributed more to that unsavory reputation of river and harbor bills than the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and naturally it has brought responses and countercharges from gentlemen who are interested in improvements of this sort. It is not known generally that under the auspices of the waterways association, of which I happen to be president, and which has often been referred to by my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], a waterway regiment was organized for service in France. I have in hand a letter from one of the officers of that regiment which to me contains a moral for the people of the United States to heed. This letter comes from the Seine district in France, and it leads me to say that the Rhine is not the only river in Europe upon which there is a great barge traffic. Only a few days ago we read that owing to the floods in the River Seine the people of Paris were being shut off from food supplies; and I stop to interpolate that every nation in Europe to-day is preparing to reconstruct or to construct canals for the purpose of carrying food supplies and lessening freight costs. This is the only country that has not been doing it extensively in recent years.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman spoke of his long experience in this matter. Does he not think it has assumed a position of greater importance at this time, in view of the extraordinarily high freight rates which we have been having as the result of the Government administration of the railroads?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think there is a great deal in that statement. It is an argument that I would support.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman would not care to have that particular controversy discussed just now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would, because waterway development was a part of the railroad-control bill as it passed this Congress, and instead of waterway development being encouraged, as it should have been encouraged, we discovered that railroad management remained with the old railroad managers, and substantially every movement to develop waterway transportation, and to furnish competition, was not encouraged, if it was not throttled.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is right.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the last statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania indicate that he is against the railroads being managed by those who have special knowledge of railroad business?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am certainly not in favor of Government ownership, and I believe the railroads should be managed by men who are best able to manage them and who know the business. [Applause.] But I believe that when we appropriated $500,000,000 to the Director General of Railroads to take over the railroads of the country, and in that bill authorized and directed him to take over the waterways and use them, if the result of that has been that when the great State of New York has spent more than $150,000,000 to build canals to be of service to the people, upon which freight can be carried for less than it can be carried upon the railroads, it does not become the administrator of the railroads under Government direction to provide and insist that the freight charges upon the waterways shall be equal to the freight charges upon the railways.

Mr. SNYDER. I should like to make a suggestion on that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the reason I say that in some instances it may be that water transportation has been throttled by Government control of railroads.

Mr. SNYDER. The Railroad Administration took over the Erie Canal after the expenditure of $150,000,000 by the State of New York, and then refused to have that canal used.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman's statement is a fair one. The rates were to be forced up to equal railroad rates.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish the gentleman would tell us something about the proposition that is delineated on the map.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will do that; and I think I can convince the gentleman in due course of time. But I want to read about the American soldier boys in France who are developing waterways there while we have been sitting idle, refusing to make provision for new projects in the United States:

> We have American crews on towboats and barges that we bought or have hired from the English and French, and it looks good to see our flag on the river. Of course, we got started long after the British in this river game and had to patch up old boats and improvise ways and shops, repair old machinery, and do a lot of things late comers usually have to do. It has been an interesting game so far, and never fear but what Americans can operate boats and barges with any of them. * * *
> As you know, these French and Belgian barges operating on the canals of the first category are all of a standard dimension and are approximately 250 tons displacement.

I read that much only to show the truth of the argument that has been made here for a long while—these many years—that these foreign countries have been utilizing waterways and using them to the full while we have neglected ours. And the gentleman from Illinois wants to know about this particular proposition.

I want to deal with it in this way: Is it too expensive? That is the proposition. That has been the sole objection to it when all is considered. Too expensive! What is the proposition? Utilizing the natural waterways along the coast inside the ocean line. Great steamships can go up along the coast when not interfered with by submarines, of course. They could come and go here inside. If we had these waterways open they could penetrate the very territory they are intended to serve without rehandling of cargoes. It has been but a few days since you read with intense enthusiasm of the President of the United States riding on the deck of an ocean greyhound up from the Mersey River to the city of Manchester, in England, amidst the huzzas of the people along the way. The people from the various towns saluted him and his trip ended with grand acclaim in the center of that great manufacturing city, 33 miles inland from the sea—just about the distance from Trenton to New York, which we propose to utilize when the upper part of the canal is authorized. Vessels carrying beef from Chicago, vessels carrying wheat from the Dakotas, vessels carrying cotton from the South, vessels from the ports of Galveston and Savannah and New Orleans carrying food to feed the people of Europe, providing them with raw material for manufacture, go up the Mersey River by the port of Liverpool to Manchester, thirty-three-odd miles away. Our own President stood on the deck of an ocean steamer only a short time ago—up through the fields of England into that inland city of Manchester. I mention this because we have even superior waterway facilities in the United States but have failed to take advantage of our opportunities.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman recall whether or not England as a country built that canal to Manchester, or did the city of Manchester build it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will tell the gentleman how it was: Liverpool stood like a dog in the manger at the port, one of those ports to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] referred a little while ago, like those over yonder on the coast, when he said, "Give them all the money on the coast, but nothing for inland waterways, because they have no boats." How, in the name of Heaven, could boats get to Manchester or to our own inland ports if we do not give them the water to get there? Here stood Liverpool on the coast barking like a dog. You can get to Manchester; oh, yes; but through Liverpool—and then by rail—unload at Liverpool and pay the difference in freight on the railroad that will bring you up to through railroad rates. Thus Liverpool could crush Manchester. Manchester was compelled, as a matter of self-defense, to contribute, and the board of trade of England helped, and the result was that the canal was cut through, and now ships laden with the meat products of the packers of Chicago pass through to Manchester. I have seen them myself unload the sides of beef at Manchester, on the dock 33—or maybe it is 36—miles from the sea, coming up by Liverpool and virtually telling that port to mind its own business. Manchester gets the meat at the same rate that Liverpool does, and the brokers in between are cut out of business. [Applause.] We could do that here at a dozen different ports.

Gentlemen ridicule the proposition, not realizing that other people are doing what we refuse to do. What is the proposition that the gentleman from Wisconsin says I am personally—and I hope patriotically—interested in? It is to connect up a part of the Delaware River, that has 27 shipyards on it this very day, with the Chesapeake, that affords admission to Baltimore, and by this route [indicating on the map] to Washington and then down through here to Norfolk and Hampton Roads to the South. Gentlemen ridicule it. They do not know and will not understand, unless they inspect the situation for themselves. Time and again we have begged them, even challenged them, to come over and look at this geographical condition that God Almighty has laid down for us to avail ourselves of. [Applause.]

The expense! The gentleman from Wisconsin worries—and I say this in all kindness—worries about the cost of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal—two and a half millions has been agreed upon by the engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall not ask for any more time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended as much as he wants.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss whether there was a defalcation by a crooked officer of the company many, many years ago. That has absolutely nothing to do with the value of this property. It does not affect the standing of any bank to-day that one of its cashiers 25 years ago robbed it of $100,000. What has that to do with the main proposition? Gentlemen have used this argument from the beginning of this discussion to destroy this project.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman name anyone who has done that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman himself has called it a bankrupt canal, and he referred to it time and again as such, and refers in the report to the fact of the defalcation.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; it is bankrupt, because for a number of years they could not make expenses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is where the gentleman is wrong. The canal has been self-sustaining since its construction and it pays 4 per cent on its bonds now and takes care of its own improvements. These are the things that aggravate when you come to discuss these matters. I shall put into the RECORD the facts, because having heard these things hurled on this floor so often I have had special inquiry made about this concern back to the days of its construction in order to get the exact truth and the facts might be ascertained. I propose to put into the RECORD the facts, so that gentlemen here and elsewhere may labor under no delusions that will affect the merits and the truth.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is not this a great saving in distance between Philadelphia and Baltimore?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; the difference between 90 and 325 miles between Philadelphia and Baltimore; but I would prefer to put it this way: Say that it is a great saving in distance between this great manufacturing center of New England [pointing] and this great productive center of the South. [Applause.]

And say this, that if that waterway is taken and worked at a depth which is standardized, so that a man or a company can know that his ships will go through without running on a sand bar, or being held up somewhere in the night, a service will be provided that will be as good as that of the railroads for heavy freight and those raw materials that do not need speedy transportation. And dealing with foodstuffs, just let me carry you back to the spring after the worst winter through which we ever passed. When the fertile fields of Florida were abloom, when the orchards were full, when the rich grounds were producing potatoes by the carload, when the people in the North were being gouged at the highest prices, when the people of New England and the soldier boys coming back from abroad were being charged $1.50 a dozen for the oranges they begged and craved for and which could not be had, it was because the railroads had issued embargoes, saying they would not carry perishable freight, and because the submarines were outside and the inland waterways were not available. You were told that you must depend upon your own locality, that you people of the great metropolis must get your fresh eggs from the henroosts in the city of New York, that you must dig your potatoes out of Broadway. The railroads could not carry them from Florida or bring them in from Iowa, and they rotted and went to waste where grown because neither the railways nor the waterways could carry them. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, my friends, it is broader than the mere question of Philadelphia and Baltimore. It is bigger than New York and Norfolk. It is a national, humanizing, protective proposition. [Applause.] I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has referred to the earnings of the canal. I would like to ask if he has the figures.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not going to discuss that, because it is so far afield from the main problem that it would take up all of my time; but I shall put every line in the RECORD, and I shall beg the gentleman to read it carefully.

Mr. GOOD. Can the gentleman tell us how many bonds are outstanding?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The same amount that is mentioned in the report. All that is proposed to be paid for this property is what is represented by bonds. All this so-called worthless stock is to be disregarded; every old back debt is cleaned up. The bonds that are paying 4 per cent constitute the value of the property as appraised, and the Government acknowledges it.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman made a statement a few moments ago, in response to a question of mine, to the effect that it had been constantly referred to in respect to this defalcation by an officer of the company. I asked him who made that statement, and the gentleman suggested that we were all making it. Now he makes the statement that that canal has been paying expenses constantly. I call his attention to Document No. 215, which is an official report, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, wherein it is shown that in 7 of the 12 years, according to the statement, the official statement that was submitted, there was a deficit in the handling of that canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. That is not on the stock; that is on the bonds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; they did not earn money in those years, but they had a surplus from previous years or earned enough in subsequent years to pay their way through. Now, will the gentleman be satisfied? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal statement to which I referred, and which explains the financial operations of the company, is herewith submitted under leave to print. The statement was prepared after careful research and investigation by Mr. Wilfred H. Schoff, secretary of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association. The information it contains was taken from official documents.

It is as follows:

CHESAPEAKE & DELAWARE CANAL.

A statement from the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, Philadelphia, Pa., December 30, 1918.

"Pursuant to authority voted by Congress in the river and harbor act of 1917, the War Department has negotiated with the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. for the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal at the price recommended by the Chief of Engineers, $2,514,289.70 (H. Doc. 391, 62d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 4 and 95, and H. Doc. 196, 63d Cong., 1st sess., p. 6). These reports confirm the recommendations made in 1907 by a commission appointed by the President of the United States (S. Doc. 215, 59th Cong., 2d sess.).

"The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal forms the connecting link between the Delaware River and Chesapeake Bay, and is an essential part of the Atlantic intracoastal waterway system as recommended by the War Department and in part adopted by Congress through the purchase and partial completion of the Chesapeake & Albemarle Canal, connecting Chesapeake Bay with the North Carolina Sound and the Atlantic Ocean below Cape Hatteras.

"The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, if Congress shall approve the recommendations of the War Department, will be converted into a tide-level canal of 12 feet depth and 90 feet bottom width, these being the standard dimensions adopted on the New York Barge Canal and for the modernized Federal waterways.

"The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal in recent years has passed traffic averaging close to 1,000,000 tons per year. In this respect, it has maintained its usefulness and activity better than others of the old small canals, its maximum tonnage in 1872 having been 1,818,772 tons. Army engineers and commercial experts, who have studied the prospects of future commerce on an improved canal, predict for it an annual traffic largely in excess of the present figures, more nearly approximating 5,000,000 tons per year.

"The main hindrance to increase of traffic on the existing canal is its inadequate size, barges being limited to the dimensions of the locks, 24 feet by 220 feet by 10 feet. On the New York Barge Canal, where locks were unavoidable, the dimensions adopted were 310 feet by 45 feet by 12 feet. The larger size, under modern conditions of traffic, is found necessary, in order to produce the economy of transportation which the modern barge affords.

"In answer to the natural inquiry how the price of $2,514,289.70, recommended by the War Department, is arrived at, it may be stated that this represents the amount for which the canal property is mortgaged, $2,602,950, less certain securities and other property held by the company, amounting to $88,660.30, the difference being $2,514,889.70.

"The amount of the mortgage, according to the annual reports of the company, is considerably less than the actual cost of the canal, and very much less than the present cost of reproducing the canal property, even deducting the locks and other structures which the Government will not use in completing its tide-level waterway over this route.

"A brief account of the formation and history of the canal company may be opportune. In the early years of our Republic the improvement of the means of communication was recognized to be the most vital issue before the people. All our early statesmen gave serious consideration to this problem. The labors of De Witt Clinton toward bringing about the completion of the Erie Canal are well known, but Americans of our time are not all aware of the fact that the engineering experience and the political foresight of George Washington were applied with almost equal persistence to the formulation of plans and the organization of companies for construction of canals and improvement of waterways in other parts of the country.

"These were recognized to be matters of public importance, and although in each case corporations were organized to undertake the work, they were semipublic, officered as a rule by men in public life, and received public support. The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. was of this sort. The surveys and levels were first made in 1769 under the auspices of the American Philosophical Society. The years of the Revolution and of the formation of the Republic were not auspicious for undertaking large public works, but the influence of George Washington was extended in support of such work throughout his administration. For the purpose of creating the connection between Delaware River and Chesapeake Bay the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. was incorporated in three States—Maryland, 1799; Delaware, 1801; Pennsylvania, 1801. The company was authorized to issue capital stock in the amount of $2,500,000, in 12,500 shares, at $200 par value. Subscription books were opened at Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, and elsewhere, but the funds received were sufficient only for a beginning, and the trade embargoes which culminated in the War of 1812 put a stop to the work.

"The President of the United States, James Madison, in his message to the Fourteenth Congress, second session, December, 1816, called attention to the desirability of soon completing the contemplated canals, and a committee of Congress reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for shares in the companies organized to construct the Chesapeake & Delaware and the Dismal Swamp Canals. The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. was then reorganized, its surveys revised, and books again opened to subscription.

"The State of Maryland (under act of December 18, 1812) had subscribed to 250 shares, $50,000.

"The State of Pennsylvania (under act of March 28, 1823) subscribed to 500 shares, $100,000.

"The State of Delaware (under act of February 5, 1823) subscribed to 100 shares, $20,000.

"The United States (under act of Congress, March 3, 1825) subscribed 1,500 shares, $300,000, and subsequently (act of Congress, March 2, 1829) 750 shares, $150,000, making a total of $450 000.

"The city of Philadelphia at about this time, though the ordinance has not been found, is believed to have subscribed 125 shares, $25,000.

"Private investors subscribed apparently 4,208 shares, of which 890 were subsequently forfeited for nonpayment of installments, and others carried as 'partly paid.'

"The condition of the stock issue, as inferred from the company's report for 1851, was as follows:

Private investors	$517, 038. 50
United States	450, 000. 00
State of Pennsylvania	100, 000. 00
State of Maryland	50, 000. 00
City of Philadelphia	25, 000. 00
State of Delaware	20, 000. 00
	1, 162, 038. 50

"The stock subscribed by the United States, the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, and the city of Philadelphia was common stock, on the same terms as that subscribed by private investors, and the acts of Congress of 1825 and 1829 provided that 'the Secretary of the Treasury shall vote for president and directors of the said company, according to such number of shares, and shall receive upon the said stock the proportion of the tolls which shall from time to time be due to the United States for the shares aforesaid.'

"The revised surveys called for a canal 13½ miles long, 60 feet surface width, 36 feet bottom width, 8 feet depth, at a cost estimated by its engineers of $1,354,364.64, and although this was slightly in excess of the stock subscriptions, the company decided to proceed with the work. The canal was completed and opened to operation in 1829, and the company, in its 1830 report, stated that it had cost a much larger sum than had been anticipated, the actual cost having been $2,201,864.03.

"The company started business, therefore, with a deficit in construction account of $1,039,825.53 and without capital, so that in 1833 the company was forced to negotiate a loan for $400,000 at 6 per cent. Its construction costs were further increased by contractors' litigations for work performed under canceled contracts, under which judgments were entered in the Delaware courts for $229,820.

From this the original construction cost may be figured at	$2, 431, 684. 03
With a consequent deficit, due to the fact that the stock issue was less than half subscribed, of	1, 269, 649. 53
The floating indebtedness arising from this, arrearages of interest, and deficits in canal operations were merged in 1836 into a funded debt of	1, 593, 185. 01
And in 1847 into a further funded debt of	796, 592. 23
In 1853 it became necessary for the company to enlarge its locks, to provide for increasing traffic, and to meet this expense a temporary loan was issued, amounting to	410, 222. 76
After completion of the new locks the three funded debts of the company were merged in 1856 into a 30-year mortgage loan at 6 per cent, amounting to	2, 800, 000. 00 which amount was slightly less than the apparent cost of construction to that date and indicated a greatly reduced value in the common stock.

"The two decades following enlargement of the canal were years of prosperous business on which relatively high tolls were collected. The stockholders received several cash dividends and their holdings were further increased by several stock dividends, so that the total issue was expanded from $1,162,038.50 to $1,903,238.50. In 1867, under legislation enacted for that purpose, the company converted its stock issue from a $200 to a $50 share basis, each holder of $200 in the old issue receiving four shares of $50 in the new.

"In 1914, at a hearing before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Coast and Insular Survey, the company reported its stock issue as follows:

	Shares.	Par.
Private investors	20, 804	$1, 057, 588. 50
United States	14, 625	731, 250. 00
State of Maryland	1, 625	81, 250. 00
City of Philadelphia	663	33, 150. 00
	37, 717	1, 903, 238. 50

The property as above stated was subject to a mortgage maturing in 1886 of $2,800,000	$2, 800, 000. 00
The directors endeavored to pay off this loan, and at various times up to 1872 set aside for that purpose, out of earnings of the company, sums totaling	806, 250. 00
supposing that they had reduced the loan to	1, 993, 750. 00
But a dishonest official reissued out of the above (converting the cash to his own use)	609, 200. 00
so that upon maturity in 1886 the loan was extended at 5 per cent for a further period of 30 years, for	2, 602, 950. 00
In 1893, owing to the depletion of the company's contingent fund, the loan holders consented to a reduction of the interest rate to 4 per cent in order to enable the company to accumulate a contingent fund of $100,000 to meet extraordinary expenses and deficits in operation as they might arise.
In 1916 the loan was extended at 4 per cent for a further period of 10 years.
The War Department has recommended acquisition of the canal property for the amount of the mortgage loan, less convertible securities, etc., in the treasury, amounting to	88, 660. 30
Making a net price of	2, 514, 289. 70

"The effect of the above-mentioned defalcation was to make it impossible for the stockholders to pay off the mortgage and acquire back their property. It, therefore, practically extinguished the value of the stock issue, amounting to $1,903.238.50. It took away nothing from the value of the canal property and it did not affect the mortgage loan of $2,602,950, on which interest has been punctually met.

"The United States, State of Maryland, and city of Philadelphia, together with numerous individuals and estates, principally descended from public-spirited citizens who subscribed to the original issue of common stock of 1823–1829, have a common equity in the property, which is mortgaged for less than its cost, but on which, owing to reduced rate of tolls and increased expenses, they have been unable in recent years to earn a sufficient profit to pay off the mortgage.

"Of this issue the United States holds 14,625 shares, the State of Maryland 1,625, the city of Philadelphia 663 shares, and private individuals and estates 20,804 shares.

"The present recommendation of the War Department is in effect that the United States acquire possession of the property by paying off the mortgage.

"By so doing, the United States, a minority holder of 14,625 out of a total of 37,717 shares of the common stock, will become sole owner of the property, while the holders of the remaining 23,092 shares, including the State of Maryland and the city of Philadelphia, will receive nothing, and will sacrifice their equity as a contribution to a national welfare.

"It is obvious that such an arrangement is advantageous to the United States.

"The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal should be public property. It should be modernized and improved and made part of a comprehensive system of inland water transportation. Its corporate difficulties have arisen from insufficient initial financing, which has made it impossible at any time for the company to improve its property to keep pace with the increasing demands of traffic, and to the fact that as a local enterprise limited by its charter to the collection of tolls upon its canal, being, therefore, in the same status as a turnpike road, having no power to carry freight or passengers through its canal, it has never been in a position to develop business between distant points, and thus to utilize the undoubted advantages of its geographical position.

"The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is needed also for purposes of even greater importance in interstate commerce. Before the United States entered the war, numerous boards of the Army and Navy reported upon the desirability of a series of safe inside passages between the great ports and the naval and military stations along the Atlantic seaboard, and the events of the war, when a few raiding submarines were able at different times to paralyze our coastwise traffic, afforded abundant proof of the need of these inside passages, if at any future time our Atlantic coast should be subjected to attack from a strong naval power.

"Government ownership and improvement of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is, therefore, an essential item in our future national defense no less than our interstate commerce. The present question is whether acquisition of the existing property by paying off the mortgage is a fair basis of settlement. The United States should not be expected to pay more than the property is worth, neither should it expect to take it at a price unfair to the security holders. The original construction was undertaken in good faith, largely as the result of the urging of the Federal Government, and individual investors subscribed of their funds to contribute to the common welfare.

"For the financial difficulties in which the company became involved, the United States was responsible equally with the investors, for they arose altogether from a stock subscription insufficient to meet the construction cost. Although the common stock has now no more than a nominal value, the stockholders can not in honor, and probably could not in law, dispose of their property for less than the amount for which it is mortgaged, and this obligation rests equally upon all stockholders, the United States, the State of Maryland, the city of Philadelphia, and the individual subscribers. On the other hand, the property has cost considerably more than the amount for which it is mortgaged.

"Among cash items in the company's reports appear the following:

Original construction 1829 (company's report for 1830, p. 16)	$2,201,864.03
Judgment under contract litigation, 1832	229,820.00
Reservoir, 1841	22,000.00
Completing same, 1844	7,300.00
Pumping engine and lifting wheel and dredge	38,200.00
Waterworks, 1853	6,900.99
Reconstruction of locks, 1855	375,177.02
Water wheel, 1857 (company's report for 1856)	6,090.00
Riparian rights purchased, 1872	7,790.50
Dredge, 1882	12,000.00
Telegraph line, 1861	1,385.00
Boilers and engines, 1865	17,866.75
Dredge, 1866	13,931.80
Telegraph line, 1872	1,725.16
Pump, 1873	1,500.00
Other items in sundry annual reports, 1851–1880, about	20,000.00
Making an apparent total of	2,963,551.25
To this should be added the steady enlargement of the canal prism by the company's dredges; a conservative estimate would be $10,000 per year, 1866 to 1918, 53 years	530,000.00
Or an apparent construction cost of	3,493,551.25

"The Agnus commission in 1907 reported the cost of production at that time as:

Dry excavation, 15,000,000 cubic yards, at $0.16	$2,400,000
Dredging 1,435,760 cubic yards at $0.14	200,000
80,000 linear feet bank revetment	70,000
44,000 perches masonry at $3	132,000
Lock at Delaware City	120,000
Lock at St. Georges	118,226
Lock at Chesapeake City	147,970
Acreage of land holdings, 8,000 acres at $50	400,000
Pumping plant at Chesapeake City	50,000
Auxiliary arrangements for summit level supply	5,000
Bridges	31,000
Houses, offices, etc	30,000
Tools, machinery, etc	1,000
Telephone line	2,000

"But it is well known that the cost of both dry excavation and dredging has materially increased since 1907 and that the company's land holdings have likewise increased in value, so that a present cost of reproduction would be more than nearly $5,000,000.

"The provision in the pending river and harbor bill for the United States to acquire the property for the amount of the mortgage appears, therefore, to be fair in every respect. Although the United States as holder of a minority of stock interest is on no more than equal terms with the other stockholders, it will receive from them the free and patriotic contribution of their equity and will take over the property for an amount considerably less than the stockholders have expended upon it—very much less than the cost of reproduction at present prices, and will then be in a position to improve and develop it for the prosperity and security of the whole country."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, it is particularly gratifying to me, having worked with these gentlemen for the purchase of this canal, to know that the House will act favorably upon this item. In reference to the canal not making more money, I merely want to cite one instance. When I was a member of the State senate the canal company came to Annapolis and asked that its tolls be increased. The State senate refused it, so that the canal has been held down to a certain revenue all the time upon the old toll basis, whereas the expenses of maintenance and all other charges have gradually increased.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman say that the canal company asked the State of Maryland to increase its tolls?

Mr. LINTHICUM. To allow them to increase the tolls.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, the tolls are the charges paid, the sums to be paid for the right to use the canal.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I term it tolls, or whatever you choose to call it.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought they wanted to increase the freight rates.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, freight rates or tolls, as you choose to term it.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a difference between tolls and freight rates.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The legislature absolutely refused it, and the canal, without any increase in its charges, has been able to pay expenses all these years and they have gone ahead until this time, keeping itself in proper shape. Now, I believe, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] says, that it is not a question for Baltimore, it is not a question for Philadelphia or any of these great cities, but it is a question for the entire Nation. It is a question of having the commerce of every port along the Atlantic seaboard transported without being subjected to the rigors and dangers of the sea to the various terminals along our coast. When Senator Burton was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of this House he came to Baltimore, and he was taken down the river and shown the great port facilities. He was shown the magnificent business we were performing, and he said, "Gentlemen, I am not interested in what business you are doing; I am interested in the port facilities, because that is a benefit to the Central West and to the entire country. I am interested in the country, and the better the harbor and the deeper the harbor you have here in Baltimore the better facilities will we have through the West." When we are enabled by deeper canals to bring this trade to Baltimore, Philadelphia, and the Atlantic seaboard, why, it is going to improve the entire transportation system of the country. I want at this time to express the deep appreciation that the country owes to the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association and to those splendid officials, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL]. They have worked in season and out of season for a proposition which they believe is to the interest of the entire land, and I believe when this work is finally completed if there be any of us left to look back upon this controversy we will say to ourselves and our friends, "How foolish we were absolutely to stand against a proposition of this mighty importance to the Nation." I do not want to take up any more of the time of the committee. I am not near so well informed upon this as these gentlemen are, but I do believe that when this item is adopted and this work is performed it will stand out as a monument to the Sixty-fifth Congress and to the gentlemen who have assisted us in the splendid undertaking. [Applause.]

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLEARY. Is it not a fact that a waterway that barely pays when it is not fully developed will be much more profitable when fully developed?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That has been demonstrated in many instances, in railroads and everything else, that when you develop an increased traffic you make it more profitable.

Mr. CLEARY. And is not that one of the greatest arguments for the improvement of these waterways?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Absolutely. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege of revising and extending my remarks in the RECORD, because it was refused when I made the request a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, again I am interested in the line of discussion of the two distinguished gentlemen who have just concluded, one from Philadelphia at one of the terminals and the other from Baltimore at the other terminal, gentlemen who approve of this canal. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, with all the eloquence of which he is capable, has talked about the attractive features of this canal for years. I am not going to question that. I do question the right or duty of this Government to buy it. The gentleman from Baltimore says that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is the president of the Inland Waterways Association, and the gentleman from North Carolina, who happens to be vice president of that association and the chairman of this committee, have worked in season and out of season, to use his own expression, to secure the adoption of this project. What chance does an ordinary man, even though he is a Member of Congress himself, have against the honorable president and vice president of this Inland Waterways Association, who are both strong Members of this body? Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania read a letter from a soldier in Germany, but he did not tell you, and he does not tell the House, that Germany controls the railroads of Germany. Ah, that is the point! He did not tell you that they owned the railroads. He did not tell you that France is going to acquire the possession of all of her railroads, and that is the reason these countries have made a success of it.

Mr. LOBECK rose.

Mr. FREAR. In just a moment. I did not interrupt these other gentlemen. Now, they have not touched the argument. The point is here that the Manchester Canal, as the gentleman from Illinois well said, was built by Manchester, not by England. This canal is not to be built by Philadelphia, it is not built by Baltimore. Oh, no. The very fact that the president and vice president of the Inland Waterways Association worked in season and out, according to the gentleman from Maryland, has had some impression, I take it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the proposition: The gentleman states in one breath that all the important governments of Europe practically, very nearly of the whole world, have taken over railroads, and that he is opposed to it, and yet the railroads destroy all the inland commerce that we know of on all the rivers and canals. And in these other governments, like in Germany, they compel the port or harbor to make its contribution. Nothing is contributed here from Philadelphia. All they have got to do is to work and work and work. And what was the expression of my good friend from Baltimore [Mr. LINTHICUM]? That they work in season and out and they finally get it. Now, I am not criticizing them. I know that these gentlemen are very distinguished gentlemen, and that they have worked hard for this project. But I say that this Government will never make a success of its inland waterways, and we all know it, if we stop to reason—and it is perfectly foolish to think otherwise—unless we control the railroad rates. On the Mississippi River, the Missouri, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, and all of those rivers you can not control your rates or control the freight rates and permit these places to live, as they do in Germany. For 7 out of 12 years this canal has failed to pay expenses. How was it paid? Out of the fund they had on hand, of course. That shows the commercial standing of the canal. The gentleman criticizes "the gentleman from Wisconsin" and says, "Why, he is not interested in waterways." Oh, yes, I am, but I am not interested in throwing this money into this canal, causing the people of this whole Government to be burdened with taxes on account of it, that are taken, to use the expression of the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the blood that is being wrung out of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent in this connection to insert a short extract in regard to railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the extract referred to:

PRIVATE OR GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILWAYS AND WATERWAYS.

Our Government is the only Nation of importance that refuses to accept a businesslike financial budget, and in equally mysterious fashion it is practically the only Government in the world that tenaciously clings to private ownership of railways, notwithstanding that policy has resulted in the destruction of our inland waterway transportation. All important railway lines are State owned in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Russia, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Japan, South Africa, Australia, and other countries. Over one-half of the lines operated under the English flag, according to statistics, or about 53,400 miles against 33,292 miles, are State owned, and the remainder are rapidly being taken over by the Government. In France the Government operates only a limited number of its railways, but by operation of law all are to come into the possession of the Government in the course of time. This principle also is invoked by the South American and Central American Governments, according to authorities that have compiled statistics on the subject. Irrespective of merits or demerits of the railway problem, Congress continually is asked to give down liberally for impossible waterways without contributions from localities, giving to the community having the longest or most powerful reach, irrespective of comparative commercial necessity or possible utility, and we are continually asked to look to Germany and other foreign governments for justification of such course. Every student of the subject knows that local contributions are generally imposed in Europe with waterway improvements, and wherever appreciable waterway traffic exists in European countries it is generally due to exceptional conditions affecting coal or other low-grade freight that are easily distinguished from our own conditions and to a control of railway rates that is exercised abroad in favor of cheap traffic for the waterways.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rockhall, Queenstown, Claiborne, Tilghman Island, Cambridge, and Crisfield Harbors, Elk and Little Elk, Chester, Corsica, Choptank, Tuckahoe, Warwick, La Trappe, Tred Avon, Wicomico, Manokin, and Pocomoke Rivers, Slaughter, Tyaskin, and Broad Creeks, Twitch Cove and Big Thoroughfare River, and Lower Thoroughfare, Deal Island, Md.; Nanticoke River (including Northwest Fork), Del. and Md.; Broad Creek River, Del.; and Tangier Channel, Va.: Completing improvement of the North Fork of Tred Avon River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 27, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $19,600; completing improvement of Wicomico River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1509, Sixty-third Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $17,100; completing improvement of Tangier Channel in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 107, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $16,434; in all, $53,134. The unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for Tilghman Island Harbor is hereby made available for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 796, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I notice there is in this bill no mention of the Baltimore Harbor, either for maintenance or for continuing improvement. I would like to have information from the gentleman as to why this was left out.

Mr. SMALL. The reason for that lies in the fact that the balance available is sufficient for the needs of Baltimore Harbor for the next fiscal year. The amount on hand is $676,000, and the Chief of Engineers reports that that amount will be sufficient for all the needs of the harbor, both for maintenance and such work of further improvement as may be necessary until the end of the next fiscal year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am very glad to have the information from the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, there are several new projects in this one paragraph. I am not going to discuss them all, because I am not here in the rôle of an obstructionist, as I have said. I am here to show the character of the bill as best I may, and to show the absolutely indefensible character of some of the items.

I take the first item there. I am perfectly willing to take the others, but I am going to take the first. It is for the North and South Forks of the Tred Avon River, $19,600. I will read from Document No. 7, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and page 3. It says:

The improvement desired is an extension of the channel up one of the forks so as to make additional terminal facilities possible. Under existing conditions the only wharf property available is controlled by one individual, and boats can not go above this property on account of lack of depth.

Think of it! One individual!

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman get the idea from the Report of the Engineers that this money is to be expended for making a channel?

Mr. FREAR. Possibly.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what it is for?

Mr. FREAR. I assume so; not for building wharves.

Mr. MADDEN. They are going to build a channel? There is no channel there now?

Mr. FREAR. Not at this farthest point.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is an outrage for the Government of the United States to spend money for any such purpose.

Mr. FREAR. Here is the absurdity of this item, which was in the 1914 bill and stricken out because the bill failed. I am reading on page 5 now. Here is a community that wants some money expended for its own individual use. If you go to California, Oregon, Washington, or the Hawaiian Islands, or elsewhere, you say, "Pay your share." Let us see what they do over in Maryland. Let us see the representation of the improvement. They do not give a nickel toward this. But it is for the benefit of these people. They say that this village has four banks, with aggregate deposits of $2,125,000; that the assessable value of property within the county is $13,000,000.

Then they go on and say down below—

The town is on two railroads, the Baltimore, Chesapeake & Atlantic and the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington.

And with those conditions this town does not give a nickel. Yet why do you put the condition in as to all other places? What right have we—I am speaking now of the committee and of the Congress, of which I am a Member—to appropriate this money for a project of that kind? Who can defend it? I do not know. A man in that community may, because he may want it. But why not act fairly and squarely with the various communities in this country and say, "If we are going to require a contribution from one place, we will require it at others." They have several banks here, and yet they do not give 5 cents toward this project, and we stick it in the bill without any evidence that it is needed at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MADDEN. This paragraph deals with a number of projects, among them being Elk and Little Elk Creek. What these Elks are used for I do not know; whether they are intended to be used for supplying meat to the soldiers abroad or to those in American camps, no one has said; whether they are intended to divert the sportsmanlike spirit of the hunter, no one says. It is evident from reading the report that there is no need for any expenditure of money here, not even for the entertainment of the hunter.

Later on we have an improvement at Twitch Cove. Now, Twitch Cove, I assume, is one of those sleepy creeks within which the water sleeps in its own bed. [Laughter.] There is no chance whatever for the promotion of any commerce at Twitch Cove, as I understand it.

Then we have Slaughter Creek. Here is the Treasury of the United States slaughtered annually for an amount unjustified in order that the political welfare of those patriotic statesmen in the neighborhood of Baltimore may be advanced. That these appropriations are unjustified and unjustifiable everybody will agree except the gentleman from Baltimore [Mr. LINTHICUM], who just took his seat a moment ago.

Then we have this new project, provided for in House Document No. 27 of the Sixty-third Congress, first session, calling for an expenditure of $19,600 for the construction of a creek where now no navigation is possible, and where I understand from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] no navigation will be had, except that water will be carried to the dock of a single individual who is in business there. It seems to me that where somebody locates a business upon dry land it is not the business of the Government to build a waterway to his plant, and nobody but the men with such imaginations as those have who come from the State of Maryland would be able to induce the Engineers of the Army to recommend such an improvement.

We have an inland waterway to be provided for on the Delaware River and Chesapeake Bay, Md., for the improvement of which we are to be called upon later to expend the further sum of $17,100.

Tangier Channel is another case where, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 27, Sixty-third Congress, we are to appropriate $16,434, when it was rejected only a short time ago by the Army engineers. But the persuasive influence of the gentleman speaking for the Democratic Party of Maryland, who sits in this House with a certificate of election to Congress, was able to change the minds of the Army engineers, and now we are called upon to spend money for that improvement. Who says there is any navigation there to justify the appropriation? Does anyone claim it? I deny it. Who replies to the contrary? No one from Maryland.

Why not then cut out the appropriation? Why should we in other sections of the country be called upon to contribute to such improvements as these—rather not improvements, but such expenditures as these? The time has come, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, when Members must speak out, when the people of the Nation demand that appropriations shall be scrutinized. There is $18,000,000,000 of a deficit in the Treasury for obligations created by reason of the war, with new appropriations demanded every day, running into the billions. There is a $6,000,000,000 bond sale soon to begin. Taxes are levied in such enormous proportions on the backs of the American people as were never known before. Still the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, with its imagination, comes here and begs of you and recommends the appropriation of money to throw into these dry creeks, where no navigation has ever been dreamed of or ever will be.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I suppose we have been waiting as usual for the annual witty speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which he always makes——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what the gentleman has been waiting for, but he may get more than he has waited for.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Well, possibly, that depends. I am willing to bandy words or anything else with the gentleman. I hope that is parliamentary. [Laughter.] When the gentleman so rudely interrupted me I was going to suggest that we had been waiting for his annual speech on rivers and harbors. Personally I am thankful that he has made it at this point, because I thought he was going to tell his old story about the water hyacinth.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I will reach that later.

Mr. DUPRÉ. And I will meet the gentleman later, as I have previously. The gentleman selects the Little Elk and the Big Elk, and he has made a tremendous impression on the House with his play on those words. So I think we might as well vote on the proposition which he has so earnestly urged be deleted from the bill.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it is not my desire unduly to take the time of the House, but only to reply to the challenge which has been extended by the learned gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] who has just spoken. He referred to Tangier Channel as being in Maryland. It is not in Maryland. It is in Virginia. I desire that the credit for that shall go to Virginia.

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I am perfectly willing to accord it.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. That is only an evidence of the ignorance of the gentleman from Illinois about the bill, that he did not even know what State it was in.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. The gentleman stated that this was rejected by the Army engineers. I desire to call the attention of the House to the document in which this project has been distinctly approved, and it is the project that is in the bill.

The gentleman from Illinois has said that there is no commerce on this channel. I desire to refer to the document in which it is distinctly shown that there is an outgoing commerce of $200,000 and an incoming commerce of $121,400, or a total of $321,400, with a channel that, at the minimum, has a depth of only 2 feet. The former report, referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], was made in 1891. I have the report here. If anyone will take the time to read that report, he will be convinced that the engineer had never examined the project. Again, we find that in 1900 the same engineer made the same report, and said that there was no commerce at Tangier Island. He said that they had a commerce only sufficient for the necessities of life. In reply to that I call attention to the report which was filed by the engineer 10 years later, showing that Tangier Island, in Chesapeake Bay, 15 miles from Crisfield, had at that time a commerce of fish, crabs, and oysters, dependent entirely upon its own boats, of $321,000. The population had increased 50 per cent, increasing from 800 people to 1,200 people, and its commerce had increased from the mere necessities of life to a total of $321,000, and that with a freight rate from Crisfield, Md., of 20 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that round about the vicinity of Crisfield and these rivers that need improvement the city of New York, the city of Philadelphia, the city of Baltimore, and the city of Washington obtain a very large proportion of their food supplies?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Of course it is true. The gentleman from Illinois has talked about commerce. Gentlemen, we are dealing here with a commerce that means a reduction in the price of the necessities of life. These people are sending you fish, crabs, and oysters. They have nothing else to deal in. They have their boats drawing from 2 to 6 feet of water, and they practically can not navigate those channels with any cargo. It is in order that they may increase this interstate commerce with Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Crisfield in the necessities of life that this appropriation is put into this bill. I merely ask you, gentlemen, in justice to your own votes, to read the report, and it will be sufficient. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to ask the gentleman if he thinks a channel with 2 feet of water in it is a thing that justifies the expenditure of public money for the creation of commerce?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia: I do, with the commerce that is there and the commerce that will come with the depth of 5 feet, which is asked for in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that there are a number of rivers in this country where the project depth ultimately hoped to be attained is only 3 feet, upon which float many thousands of tons of interstate commerce. I recall one river with a depth of only 3 feet which a few years ago had a commerce of $13,000,000 of cotton floated in one year, in addition to other products in interstate commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

James, Nansemond, Pagan, and Appomattox Rivers, Va.: Completing improvement of Pagan River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 591, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $25,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry about an item which has been passed. If I am mistaken in the conclusions which I have drawn with regard to it, I should like to be corrected.

When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was discussing that item of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal I was anxious to know what the receipts were and the amount that was paid annually, and the gentleman said it was in the report. I do not find it in the report, but he has furnished me with a copy of the hearings, in which I find what seems to me to be a very extraordinary showing. According to this statement, on page 36 of the hearings, it will be seen that for 31 years there was part of the time a net return and part of the time there was a loss, and, if my figures are correct, the net profit for that time was approximately $120,000 and the net loss was $130,000.

I can well understand, therefore, why the cost of this canal, according to the statement on page 34—the original cost was $2,201,000 cash; received from stock subscriptions $1,162,000, and the balance by bond issue of $1,036,000. The amount subscribed for stock by the United States was $450,000. Now, this bonded indebtedness of the company has increased from $1,036,000 to over $2,500,000. They paid the dividends out of borrowed money, according to the report shown here. If you are going to pay interest at 4 per cent on $2,500,000, it will require an annual expenditure of $100,000. The showing here is that for 30 years the net loss is $10,000 over and above the receipts when it comes to deduct the operating expenses. So instead of paying the interest out of the operation it has been obliged to borrow $10,000 to operate the plant, and all of this interest must have been paid out of borrowed money. We might as well understand when we buy this plant that we are buying something that is hardly paying, has not paid for 30 years, a cent above the operating expenses, unless the figures that I have read are incorrect.

Mr. CLEARY. If the gentleman will yield, suppose a waterway 7 or 8 feet deep was not profitable to the owners, would they not immediately and naturally improve it; or, if new owners bought it, would they not improve it, expecting to make it profitable because of the improvement?

Mr. GOOD. That may be; it may be made a profitable thing. I am only talking about what has been done.

Mr. CLEARY. It is what will be done that we are interested in. We want to know if we can make it profitable. There may be a waterway only 6 or 7 feet deep which is unprofitable, but if made 10 or 12 feet deep may be of great profit.

Mr. GOOD. That may be true; I am only trying to find out if the figures are true that I quote from the hearings as to the actual conditions in regard to this canal.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina a question. We have now finished 8 or 9 pages of a bill of 31 pages. We commenced the session this morning at 11 o'clock, got to the bill about half-past 11, and now what is the gentleman's intention as to proceeding with the bill this afternoon?

Mr. SMALL. I will be frank with the gentleman. A request was submitted this morning by gentlemen on both sides that we make an effort to complete the bill to-day.

Mr. MANN. I understand, and I hoped that would be possible; but Members want to know how late they are going to be kept here.

Mr. SMALL. I would be glad to continue the consideration of the bill until after 6 o'clock, and yet I realize that we are dependent upon the will of the committee. The bill has been before the House, not under consideration, since January 2, and this is the first time we have been able to resume consideration. The amount of business before the House is so great that we deem it urgent that we complete the bill as soon as possible. I have difficulty in answering the gentleman except from my own viewpoint. I would be glad to sit until 8 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any special object in continuing between 6 and 8 o'clock and then stopping, because it is quite certain that there would not be very many here between 6 and 8 o'clock. The gentleman would not be able, in my judgment, to continue unless he so announced now and have a quorum present.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion to the chairman of the committee? Would it not be well to sit until half-past 5 and then resume at 8 o'clock?

Mr. SMALL. That would be agreeable to the chairman, but my observation has been that once the Members of the House have dispersed for the evening they do not return.

Mr. MANN. It is not fair to have an evening session of the House without giving advance notice. Gentlemen have a right to make engagements for the evening, unless they have notice that Congress will be in session, and while they might break their engagement it is hardly fair to them.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Would the gentleman consider a suggestion to sit until 6 o'clock and then adjourn until morning?

Mr. MANN. We might meet at 11 o'clock. I would be willing to meet at half-past 10.

Mr. SMALL. What would the gentleman from Illinois suggest?

Mr. MANN. I think it would be desirable to adjourn at 6 o'clock and to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. I had hoped that we could get through with the bill to-day. We have no desire on this side of the House to delay the consideration of these bills.

Mr. SMALL. I am sure the gentleman is acting in good faith. I think, under all conditions, Mr. Chairman, it would be advisable to announce now that I will move at 6 o'clock that the committee rise, and then I will ask unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I hope no one will make an objection.

I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] further to make the announcement that we shall endeavor to complete the consideration of this bill to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway from Norfolk, Va., to the sounds of North Carolina: For maintenance, $250,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, in line with what has been said, let me assure the House that I have no intention to delay the passage of the bill, but this is the first day we have had for discussion, and when we are charged, those of us who are opposed to certain kinds of legislation, with intellectual dishonesty, when the public-building bill is set aside, which is a bill of the same general character, because the members of that committee realize that at this time of all times it is unwise to force such a bill upon the attention of the House, then it occurs to me that it is right to oppose a bill of this kind, and I owe no apology to anyone, and when the gentleman charges us with intellectual dishonesty I assure him that so far as I am able I want to point out some of the defects, and among other items there is the one before us. This is an item for the expenditure of $250,000 for a canal that runs down to the sounds of North Carolina. Not one dollar was recommended by the Army engineers to the committee for this item. About $250,000 has been expended thus far, with a balance on hand. The Army engineers reported on page 569 in regard to this canal running down into North Carolina no estimate for additional funds, and that as the maintenance of this waterway at the present time is not considered of sufficient importance to justify the expenditure of any funds in addition to the balance available on July 1, 1918, they do not request anything, not one dollar. Think of it; no estimate for additional funds has been made; it is not considered of sufficient importance to justify the expenditure of any funds in addition to the balance available; and yet this committee adds $250,000, a quarter of a million dollars. Intellectual dishonesty! Who selected the items? Who added the money to the bill for a canal that lost 40 per cent of its commerce in two years? You will find that on page 569 of the report. No estimate for an additional amount is demanded, and here the committee gives practically the same amount that has been expended upon this canal during the last 25 years. The public-building bill was set aside because of its unsavory record. Can you think of anything worse than that item—a quarter of a million dollars—when the engineers say they do not need it? Who put it in? Let us find out about this question of intellectual dishonesty. Some one put it in. Over half the insignificant commerce on this waterway is logs and lumber that float on that small stream. The engineers say in the 1918 report they do not need the money, and do not want it, and you put in a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I regret the necessity for making a brief comment. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] states with reference to this item that no recommendation was made in the report of the Chief of Engineers. The next paragraph in the bill is as follows:

Waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $750,000.

The gentleman may make the same criticism as to this latter item.

Answering his criticism, I submit this comment: Before the committee entered upon the consideration of this bill I made a statement of some length to the committee, and it was discussed before the committee. Presumably the gentleman heard it. The Chief of Engineers made the estimates, which are contained in annual report, during the summer. Those estimates were made after conferences with the Secretary of War and with a number of the members of the committee, including the chairman of the committee. At that time it was agreed that all estimates for maintenance and further improvement should be, to use a familiar expression, "cut to the bone," and the estimates in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers were made during the summer, when the war was still in progress. When we began the consideration of this bill, at the convening of this session, on the 2d of December, as everyone knows, the armistice had been signed on November 11 and peace had come.

There have been many conferences held with the Secretary of War, with the Chief of Engineers, and between Members of the House as to the policy that should be pursued in this bill, and it was agreed that we should have a bill framed along lines appropriate to normal or peace conditions. Therefore the Chief of Engineers increased the estimates in some instances and submitted estimates in other instances where no estimates had been originally submitted. There was originally an estimate for $500,000 for the Delaware River from Philadelphia to the sea. That was increased to two and a half million dollars. There was an estimate of $400,000 for the Schuylkill River, which was increased to $1,000,000. There was an estimate made during the summer of $3,000,000 for the East River, and that was increased to $4,000,000. I might recite further instances where estimates for maintenance and further improvements were increased when we entered upon the consideration of this bill on December 2 last.

Does the gentleman from Wisconsin know that? As a member of the committee should he know it? He, of course, says that these two items happen to be in North Carolina and would have the Committee of the Whole draw the inference that for some reason, improper or otherwise, the chairman of the committee was influential in having the Chief of Engineers make an estimate which was unnecessary and not in the public interest. I do not expect to detain the committee at length in replying to that inference, but I merely wanted to say, Mr. Chairman, in response to several statements which have been made in debate about the amount of the estimates contained in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers and the amounts appropriated in this bill, that increases were made, with the full knowledge and consent of the committee, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers and, as we all believe, in the public interest.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I note in the report, page 3, a statement that after the armistice was signed there was a conference of the President, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Engineers, and certain appropriations for maintenance were increased. I assume that is what the gentleman referred to in part?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. As a result the Chief of Engineers increased the estimates on certain of these items.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I note further down in the list of these increases $250,000 for the waterway from Norfolk, Va., to the sounds of North Carolina. Do I understand the gentleman that the engineers in this supplemental estimate specifically mentioned this item?

Mr. SMALL. They did.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman defer it until the next item is read?

Mr. FREAR. I do not expect to take two minutes in response. I do not want to have the House misled, and I do not propose to mislead if I can help it. On page 569 of the Engineer's Report—and I read it for the third time—the Chief of Engineers and the Board of Engineers—and this is not Gen. Taylor who made the change, but this is what the Chief of Engineers said. Listen:

No estimate for additional funds is made, as the maintenance of this waterway, this canal, at the present time is not considered of sufficient importance to justify the expenditure of any funds in addition to the balance available on July 1, 1918—

Now, how much?—

Nine hundred and twenty-nine dollars—

On hand.

That is on page 569. The waterway is not considered of sufficient importance in time of war or peace, and yet $250,000 has been added. Who added it? Who brought in the report of these 70 projects? There has been added $250,000, a quarter of a million, almost as much as has been expended on this one item in the last 25 years. Why? Is it the fact that the distinguished gentleman who charges us with intellectual dishonesty will not be the chairman of the committee next time and will not have the selection of all these items? May that possibly influence his opinion at this time? I wonder! Mr. Chairman, until the insinuations, the unfair and unjust insinuations, were thrown out I had no idea of going into these items, but I propose to do it in order that the House may know who is improperly influenced in this discussion and who desires to present the matter frankly. Do you suppose if you had gone to the Chief of Engineers you could have gotten $250,000 added to your project, I ask the different members of this committee, to an item of little benefit and aid to commerce? Do you think you could? Just take it to yourselves. Why, of course not; of course not. It takes a friend in court to get such a remarkable concession as large as this when the Engineer's Report says it is not important, that no importance is attached to it in time of war or in time of peace or any other time. Yet here is $250,000 added to the whole project.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield? I am not particularly enthusiastic about this project, but I think we ought to be fair to the gentleman from North Carolina. The gentleman from Wisconsin asked who put this in, and apparently the President and the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers put it in.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized to oppose the pending amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it seems rather strange that where the Chief of Engineers says that he is unwilling to recommend the expenditure of $929 for a further improvement of a channel the Committee on Rivers and Harbors are proposing to expend $250,000 on it.

I read from page 569 of the report, which says:

Proposed operations: With the funds available, necessary examinations will be made and, if required, shoals and snags will be removed.

Shoals and snags! That is quite a navigable stream, I judge, where you have to remove the shoals and the snags in order to get water through a channel, to say nothing at all about getting boats through it. He says further:

No estimate for additional funds is made, as the maintenance of this waterway at the present time is not considered of sufficient importance to justify the expenditure of any funds in addition to the balance available on July 1, 1918.

Now, there was nine hundred and some odd dollars available July 1, 1918. The Chief of Engineers says that the channel is not considered of sufficient importance to justify the expenditure of more money than is available. And yet we find in this bill an item of $250,000 to remove the snags and the shoals. Why do we want to remove the snags? Is it to provide for navigation? Why do we want to remove the shoals? Is it that we may be able to float boats or that the water may be allowed to run through the channel without overflowing the banks? Is it because we have land to protect on the sides of this channel, or is it because we want navigation? Is there any justification, in the face of the statement by the Chief of Engineers that the $929 available is all the money that ought to be expended under any circumstances, in appropriating $250,000? Is it possible that under the present state of the Government finances, where everybody is being taxed to the limit, that we are willing to display our extravagance by reporting in favor of an appropriation of $250,000, where the responsible executive official of the Government, the Chief of Engineers, says there is no justification whatever for the expenditure of more than $929?

I think the House, under all the circumstances, ought to vote to strike this item out. There can be no justification for doing anything else. Are we to go before the people with the declaration that we are willing to spend $250,000 under the present conditions, where the Chief of Engineers says we ought not to even spend $929? Has the Committee on Rivers and Harbors so far forgotten its obligations to the people of America that it is willing to stand sponsor here for the appropriation of a quarter of a million dollars under such circumstances? Has the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the courage to come before the House and say to the Members that they are willing to stand for such a recommendation in the face of the adverse report of the Chief of Engineers? Are we to understand that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no consideration whatever for the state of the country's finances? Are we to understand that they pay no attention whatever to the already great load that is being carried on the backs of the American people? Are we to understand that in the face of idleness everywhere, of the returning soldiers without jobs, of the returning soldiers unable to get their pay, that, notwithstanding all this, we are asked to expend $250,000 of the people's money when there is no justification whatever for any expenditure at all? Has the River and Harbor Committee so far forgotten the sense of propriety that it will come before the Congress and recommend the expenditure of this vast sum in the face of the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers that there is no justification for it? Does the River and Harbor Committee expect to command the respect and the confidence of their associates on this floor with such a recommendation in the face of all the facts?

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors should himself move to strike this item from the bill, for no man, knowing all the facts in the case, can justify it, and no person knows the facts better than the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. And I am unwilling, as one Member of this House, to go before the American people and say that I will vote for the expenditure of $250,000 of their money for an improvement that does not under any circumstances even encourage the development of navigation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. SMALL. Pardon me, in order to make a request. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Five minutes, or I will restrict it to three minutes if the gentleman desires.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I will have to object to that, because I expect to move to strike out the item, and I want to debate that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to call to the attention of the House the iniquity of the item.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman may prefer that I should say what I have to say on the next item. If so, very well.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the item out, and on that motion I desire to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves to strike out the paragraph, page 8, lines 23 and 24.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to make any point of order, but I think the gentleman must realize that there ought to be an end to the debate. The gentleman has already discussed this.

Mr. MADDEN. I have not discussed this motion.

Mr. SMALL. But the gentleman's discussion is entirely pertinent.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will submit a point of order to the Chair, I will abide by that, whether I speak or not.

Mr. SMALL. I will not make a point of order, even if there is delay.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the present state of the Government's finances, with $18,000,000,000 of obligations standing against the United States, having expended $25,000,000,000 to conduct the war so far, having appropriated $36,000,000,000 with which to conduct the war, having gone to the American people to ask them to buy bonds in unlimited quantities in order to conduct the war, having shown beyond any controversy the injustice of the item proposed for the expenditure of $250,000 where the Chief of Engineers says we ought not to spend any money at all, I submit to the membership of the House that this item ought not to remain in the bill.

I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, if he himself does not believe that under all the circumstances this item should be stricken from the bill? I ask the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, if anybody in the War Department recommended the appropriation of $250,000 in the face of the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers to the effect that we ought not to expend any money on this project? I ask the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, whether or not there is any commerce that justifies the expenditure of $250,000 as provided in this item of the bill? I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to say to the House on his honor as a man that this $250,000 proposed appropriation is justified in any sense for navigation. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to say to the House, upon his honor as a man and as chairman of this great committee, whether the removal of the sand bars, if I may so speak, and the removal of the snags from this creek or this channel is of sufficient importance to the navigation of the country to justify the further obligation of $250,000 against the Treasury of the United States? I feel justified in saying that the gentleman from North Carolina is sufficiently honorable, sufficiently honest, sufficiently interested in the integrity of the bill, sufficiently interested in the preservation of the integrity of the Treasury that when put upon his honor he will say that this item should be stricken from the bill; and I ask every man here who believes in maintaining the integrity and the honor and the dignity of the House of Representatives to vote to strike the item from the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have not always been in accord with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Very often, in fact, I have differed from them; but I want always to treat the committee fairly, and I do not want any statements to be put into the RECORD here, to be read by the public at large, that will indicate that committee is not dealing fairly with the House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has stated over and over again that the Chief of Engineers did not recommend this item. Let me read from the hearings just a brief statement with reference to what the Chief of Engineers says with reference to this project if the appropriation were given:

The section of the inland waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort in North Carolina, which is known as the North Carolina cut, and which gives a thoroughly protected channel, is going to take some time to complete—several years to complete. If an appropriation were given for this project—for the waterway from Norfolk, Va., to the sounds of North Carolina—of $250,000, and for the inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, of $750,000, I think that within the next year or a year and a half we could have a 12-foot channel through from Norfolk to Beaufort, and I would recommend that those appropriations be made.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman inform the House from whose testimony he is reading?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. From that of Gen. Taylor.

Mr. FREAR. He is not the Chief of Engineers. Here is the report of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Who was Gen. Taylor acting for if not for the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. FREAR. He is one of the engineers of the War Department?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Wisconsin refers to Gen. Harry Taylor as not being the Chief of Engineers. Everyone connected with the committee knows that Gen. Harry Taylor is assistant to the Chief of Engineers, having charge of rivers and harbors, and in every recommendation that he makes he represents the Chief of Engineers, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] knows that.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just a moment. I will take only five minutes. Of course, it would be idle folly to expend $250,000 to clear a channel of snags and sand bars and have then only 2 or 3 feet of water, and no man in this House would be justified in voting for such a project. But it is altogether a different question as to whether a man would be justified in voting for a 12-foot channel from Norfolk, Va., down to Beaufort, N. C., as is proposed here. The whole proposition is a part of the great intercoastal canal which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] eloquently described to the committee a little while ago, and at that time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] did not see fit to move to strike out the other items connected with it.

This is part and parcel of that project. Ordinarily I do not think that money should be expended on such projects, but in the face of the railroad rates that we now have, that tend to hamper business and destroy trade, and in consideration of the further fact that it is proposed to employ the returning soldiers upon great public enterprises, I think that this project can well have much argument in its support, and it ought not to be stigmatized as one that nobody can justify in conscience and reason here upon the floor. If a waterway can be constructed with 12 feet of depth from Norfolk to Beaufort, there is no question on earth but that thousands of tons of commerce will float upon it every year, and I think it would be of great benefit in many directions.

Mr. FREAR. This is a project which amounts to about $5,000,000. I think the gentleman must have misunderstood or misread the report of the engineers giving a 12-foot canal.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is talking about the whole project in stating the cost. I have read what the engineer, Gen. Taylor, said, and I assume that he knows his business. I have read it just as it is stated here. This is a great enterprise, one of the greatest enterprises ever undertaken in the history of this country. Along the Atlantic coast there float millions of tons of shipping exposed to the storm of the seas and to destruction. Can we afford to spend this money? I have some doubt about it, I will admit, at this particular time; yet the canal would be of great advantage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know of any mariner who has asked for protection for navigation in an inland canal for his ship, who desires to keep away from the deep-sea navigation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman can answer that for himself. I am not interested in the question, though I know Cape Hatteras is called the "graveyard of the Atlantic."

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has offered himself as an authority on this question and I thought he had some evidence.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is immaterial what the deep-sea sailor wants. A barge canal of 12 feet would do an enormous business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would not consume any time except from a query put to me by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. At this particular time I am not willing to go into this subject fully. I will say, however, that in my opinion this appropriation is entirely in the public interest and will subserve a most useful public purpose in the interest of navigation and commerce.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 7, noes 40.

Mr. MADDEN made the point of order that no quorum was present, and subsequently withdrew it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $750,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMALL. Before the gentleman proceeds, I wish to ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. This is a three-quarter of a million dollar project. Will the gentleman make it 15 minutes?

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FREAR. I would like about three minutes to close and five minutes to open.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I object; I do not think it is fair to ask to close debate before debate is begun. As a matter of fact, the gentleman can not close debate before debate has commenced.

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that the request is out of order before the debate begins.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman can make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I object.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, these two canals run near each other. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] a little while ago read from Gen. Taylor's report that he made before the committee. I do not want gentlemen to forget that we are paying nearly 100 per cent more for dredging than we paid two years before. The Chief of Engineers said that no estimate for additional funds is made for that canal and that it is not considered at the present time of sufficient importance to justify the expenditure of $250,000.

What would you give for that kind of testimony? Why was not he confronted with this record? Who put the item into this bill? Now, look at this statement here. On page 574 we find $640,725 balance on this insignificant waterway now under discussion, and yet the committee has inserted without request of engineers $750,000. The canal has 148,000 tons of commerce, and over half of that is logs, timber, and sand.

We have spent on this project something like $3,744,000, and all the commerce does not reach one-tenth part of little harbors that we have up in my country. Still you propose, after the engineers submitted nothing, because they had a large amount on hand—the engineers' report shows $649,000, according to this book, and yet the committee add three-quarters of a million dollars more. What did the engineers say about it? Did they ask for it? Oh, not one, except Gen. Taylor, who is a willing witness. It is all on one side, and it makes no difference, for he does not pay the bill, he does not pay the taxes. On page 573, after considering this matter carefully, they have sufficient funds, the engineers say, due to war conditions.

You have got back to war conditions in this item:

No estimate is submitted for beginning constructive operations on the part of the waterway between Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds.

I take it that that is not the project that they have in mind here, but they do not ask for anything. Nothing was asked in this report for proposed operations. They had a sufficient amount. It says:

The river and harbor act approved July 18, 1918, appropriated $500,000 for this work, making a total of $649,725.37 available for expenditure upon the improvement.

And he tells how that money is to be expended. He does not ask for anything more. But the gentleman who charges the House with intellectual dishonesty, the vice president of the Inland Waterway Association, who makes his accusations against Members of Congress, has an item of $750,000 added to this in addition to the $250,000 for the other canal in North Carolina, his State.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The chairman of the committee never charged the House with intellectual dishonesty. He only charged one member of it.

Mr. FREAR. And the gentleman from Louisiana, with five projects in the bill, representing, as he does, the president of the National River and Harbor Congress, who is running over here and there, is equally interested in this bill.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I hope that I may——

Mr. FREAR. I object to the gentleman talking in my time. The gentleman can get his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that anyone talking here against these items has to meet every man who has a project of importance in the bill, for Members feel that that is the most interesting thing in their minds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. FREAR. I have three minutes in which to reply.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I would rather listen to the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Louisiana has not the privilege of determining that.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, the only trouble with the gentleman from Wisconsin is that he is unfamiliar with the project that he is talking about. He continually harps with regard to some five projects which I have, that are yet to come. As a matter of fact, as I have previously suggested to my friend from Illinois, I wish I had 10 projects, but they will be discussed in their own proper time. The matters to be discussed now are those before the committee for consideration.

The gentleman from Wisconsin has been speaking about "Mr. Taylor." I do not know whether he is talking about Col. TAYLOR, of Arkansas, or whom, but I imagine he has been talking about Brig. Gen. Taylor, who is the Assistant Chief of Engineers, and who knows something more about rivers and harbors than the gentleman from Wisconsin does.

The section of the inland waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort in North Carolina—is going to take several years to complete.

I tried to get the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] to admit that the report of the Chief of Engineers was made on the basis of July 1. The gentleman from Illinois would not admit that. I hope somebody will pin down the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and make him say so. I doubt if they can pin him down even to so patent a fact as that the report of the Chief of Engineers was made on the basis of July 1, and under the law, as I understand it, that report had to be in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury by October 15. On July 1, in spite of the gallant efforts of our boys from Wisconsin and other States, our country was very much concerned in the conflict which was being waged. Subsequently, when the matter came to the attention of the committee, the armistice had been signed, and the representative of the Chief of Engineers, without any invitation or solicitation, of his own accord made many suggestions, as I have already told the House, with regard to amending the report which the Chief of Engineers had previously made.

Among them was an increased amount for this inland waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort, to be found in a document which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] hates to read, but which is available to all other Members, namely, the hearings before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which the gentleman is an honored and loquacious member. So I appeal from this obsolete document from which he has been quoting to the hearings before the committee, and particularly to the report and statement of Gen. Taylor, the accredited representative of the War Department upon that occasion. It is useless to call it to the attention of the gentleman, because he does not want to know, but it may be well to tell the other Members of the House that whenever the gentleman from Wisconsin is talking about something it might be well to inquire whether he is reading from the hearings before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, where Gen. Taylor, the Assistant Chief of Engineers, presented revised estimates, or from these very parsimonious estimates made last July, when we thought that things might happen to this country which, thank God, have not happened.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to call attention to this proposal to appropriate $750,000 for the waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C. Reading from the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, June 30, 1918, I find the following:

At the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, there was an available balance, exclusive of outstanding liabilities and contract obligations, of $149,725.37 for expenditure under this project. The river and harbor act approved July 18, 1918, appropriated $500,000 for this work, making a total of $649,725.37 available for expenditure upon the improvement. It is intended to expend the money available for completion of the part of the inland waterway which lies between Norfolk, Va., and Albemarle Sound, N. C., and for making surveys, etc., as follows:

Operations under contract:
To complete dredging in the North Landing River, Va.	$15,948.69
To complete dredging in the Southern Branch of the Elizabeth River, Va.	237,780.00
Total		253,728.69
Work with United States plant:
To complete dredging of Virginia Cut, including cost of removal of logs, etc.	$41,800.00
To complete dredging in North Landing River, Va., including cost of removal of logs, etc.	211,000.00
To remove old lock, west end of Virginia Cut	40,000.00
To complete survey and secure options on land between Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds	11,000.00
Acquirement of land required for improvement of South Branch of Elizabeth River	15,000.00
		$318,800.00
Engineering, supervision, and contingencies		77,196.68
Total		649,725.37

It is proposed to commence the work to be done under contract, provided the necessary arrangements can be made for doing the work, about November 1, 1918, to prosecute it at an average rate of expenditure of about $25,000 per month, and to complete it in about 10 months. This is a very rough estimate of the time of beginning and rate of progress, due to the prevailing conditions in the matters of labor and material, and available plant, resulting from the war. If arrangements can not be made for doing this work by contract, it is proposed to perform the necessary dredging and work incidental thereto by the use of Government plant and hired labor.

It is proposed to prosecute the work to be done by Government plant and hired labor according to the following schedule:

Operation of U. S. dredge Currituck, 20 months, at $12,000 per month	$240,000
Operation of U. S. snag boat Roanoke, 10 months, at $1,280 per month	12,800
Survey, 5 months, at $2,200 per month	11,000
Removal of lock, 4 months, at $10,000 per month	40,000

And below I find the following:

Due to war conditions, no estimate is submitted for beginning constructive operations on the part of the waterway between Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds, N. C.

Mr. FREAR. Six hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars was the balance on hand.

Mr. MADDEN. They had $649,000 on hand. They say they can expend only $303,000 in the next 20 months. Yet in addition to the $649,000, out of which $303,000 can be expended in 20 months, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors brings in a proposal to appropriate $750,000 more. According to the statement made by the Chief of Engineers, there would be $384,000 left at the end of 20 months from the 1st of November, 1918; and so, with $750,000 more proposed, we have $1,349,000 to begin a work of which only $303,000 can be expended in 20 months. Why do we need the $750,000? If no part of the $750,000 can be used at all until after the expenditure of the $649,000, and only $300,000 of the $649,000 can be used within 20 months from the 1st of November, 1918, what is the sense in appropriating $750,000 now? I suppose it is useless to appeal to the good sense or judgment of gentlemen who have projects in the bill, but there is no harm in stating the facts and putting them into the RECORD, so that the public may understand that, notwithstanding the fact that there is no need whatever for the money, that it can not be used, yet the River and Harbor Committee insists upon appropriating.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Members may see the commercial economy and advantage of shortening the distance between Philadelphia and Baltimore, instead of having the commerce that arises in those respective cities go around the Delaware Capes and up the Chesapeake and vice versa to the respective terminals through the Government acquiring the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, having a length, I believe, of 13 miles; but when you come before the Congress in these times with a project that is now under consideration seeking to create an inland waterway 12 feet in depth paralleling the entire coast from New England down to Florida and from Florida around to the Gulf, when the ocean is open at all times, in all kinds of weather for all kinds of navigation, I can not understand the justification of sinking $5,000,000, which this one project involves, from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet. I have been on the coast on occasions, and I have seen little dories out in the ocean less than 25 feet in length going through tempestuous seas, and yet you wish here to establish a route for pleasure boats, to avoid perhaps the high seas, by establishing a canal uniform in depth to 12 feet. What we do find are the terminal facilities along this canal in these several hundred miles from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet, which the engineer's estimate for the project to cost more than $5,000,000, of which $750,000 is voted in this bill. There is no objection on the part of Members who are interested in worthy river improvements in these times when it is necessary to employ labor to have the Government expend funds, but there is righteous indignation on the part of Members of this House in sinking money on pleasure canal routes. I read from the report of the Chief of Engineers, page 572, as to what are the terminal facilities in this stretch of territory from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet.

The north end of this waterway is in Norfolk Harbor, the terminal facilities of which are described under this heading in the report on that improvement. Following is a list of the other wharves on the waterway: At Great Bridge, Va., at the northern end of the Virginia Cut, 1 wharf and warehouse; on the Virginia Cut, 2 wharves with warehouses; at Munden, Va., 1 wharf and warehouse; on Currituck Sound, 1 wharf and warehouse; on the Carolina Cut, 2 wharves with warehouses; and on North River, 3 small wharves. All of the above wharves and warehouses are privately owned. The wharves are of the bulkhead and open power work type and the warehouses are simple wooden structures. All are understood to be open to general public use upon the payment of wharfage. Physical connection with railroads exists only at Munden, Va., the terminus of the Currituck branch of the Norfolk-Southern Railroad. No highways lead to the different parts of the waterway, except where public roads touch the stream. The facilities are considered adequate for existing commerce.

Mark you this as to whether there is warrant for any traffic development on this inland waterway when the ocean is open within a few miles for all character of vessels.

No highways lead to the different parts of the waterway, except where public roads touch the stream. The facilities are considered adequate for existing commerce.

All facilities are considered adequate for existing commerce. That is the supreme and final judgment of the Chief of Engineers, and yet the committee comes in here with an appropriation of three-quarters of a million dollars and asks, because there is need to employ labor, to sink it in this canal paralleling the coast. It will require wild imagination indeed for anyone to imagine that there will be any commerce for years and years on a project that the report shows will total more than $5,000,000 in expenditure and where there are no developing aids to commerce except one railroad. How can you justify such an extravagant expenditure when you are calling upon the people to raise billions of dollars by loans to carry on the Government for the next fiscal year?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will my friend yield for a moment? I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin, the other gentleman from Wisconsin, to page 39 here, where Gen. Taylor, the representative of the Chief of Engineers, urged this appropriation. Probably there is no use to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to anything except the Engineer's Report, which was made last July.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is the solemn pronouncement of the Chief of Engineers, who says in the last line:

The facilities are considered adequate for existing commerce.

There is nothing that goes beyond——

Mr. DUPRÉ. There is the report of the Chief of Engineers through his representative, Gen. Taylor, who says an absolutely different thing.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman pardon me to make a request?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, after the gentleman from New York concludes, who, as I understand, desires five minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin desires three minutes——

Mr. FREAR. Make it five; I may not take more than two or three——

Mr. SMALL. Then I would like a brief time, and I ask that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin, who was last heard, has misconstrued entirely a single sentence in the Engineer's Report, and upon that he bases a very specious and very illogical argument. He says there is a sentence, in effect, that the existing facilities are deemed adequate for the existing commerce. Now, to what does that refer? The gentleman takes that in its broadest sense, separates it from the context, treats it as though it were a single sentence with no connection whatever with what precedes it, and yet it is limited entirely to that which preceded it; and it says this only and means this only: That the existing facilities, so far as wharves are concerned, so far as highways are concerned, are adequate to accommodate the existing commerce, and that is all that it says.

It has no such reference at all as the gentleman supposes, and if he had read the report carefully he would have seen that it had no reference at all to the question of the stream itself, the waterway, being adequate for the commerce which can be transported upon it, and which is the question at issue. And that is about the way the gentlemen who are criticizing this bill get their material. They think that the Chief of Engineers is an editor and a writer instead of being, as he is, a scientific man who deals with these matters as an engineer, and they find some one sentence of this kind and upon that they build a fairy tale which has absolutely no possible connection with the facts which are involved.

Now, let us see what is involved here. The fact is that this project has been in existence for a considerable length of time. It is a 12-foot project and the work at the northerly end is well under way. It is a project which is 190—practically 200—miles long. It is a project which in its incomplete condition attracts about 700,000 to 800,000 tons of freight per year, and has attracted that amount of tonnage all through until war time was reached, and even in war time it has attracted about 400,000 tons. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] says that this is a pleasure way; that he has seen yachts which dared the tempests of the ocean. Of course he has. But the barges which carry freight do not dare the ocean. They take even on this inadequate canal to the amount——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I have not the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think you have time for facts.

Mr. DEMPSEY. They take it to the amount of hundreds of thousands of tons, and have taken it ever since the project was commenced. That is the situation. And these gentlemen go back to the time previous to the war and say, "You can not use $750,000." Of course, you could not at the time the engineer made the printed report. But war conditions have ceased. The conditions are totally changed. The Engineer Department can to-day obtain dredges. They are ready to do this work. And they make their recommendations not as of six months or eight months ago, but they make their recommendations as to the conditions prevailing to-day. And with those conditions before them they say the amount recommended can be used.

Now, let us just take for a moment the tone of this criticism. I believe gentlemen can discuss these matters and not become personal. And I believe that gentlemen can discuss these matters and refer solely to facts. I believe that gentlemen can discuss these matters and be fair to their associates. I believe that gentlemen can discuss these matters and not indulge in personalities. I say that this project comes before the committee with the indorsement of the Chief of Engineers. And it comes before the committee also justified by the amount of commerce, justified by the changed conditions, and the amount which is asked can be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have five minutes in conclusion. Would the gentleman from New York like to have two of those minutes?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; I have finished.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it the arrangement that the gentleman from Wisconsin should close?

The CHAIRMAN. The arrangement was for 15 minutes, and the Chair understood it would be divided between the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. SMALL. Would the gentleman like to get some of my time?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A minute or two.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to make this further parliamentary inquiry. Has not the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] already spoken on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. I understand; but the Chair also understands it was the unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] was to have five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], who always gets the bouquets thrown at him, also gets four millions in this bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Because the project merits it. That is the reason.

Mr. FREAR. I can not question the gentleman's argument on that, and I do not pretend to do that. When the gentleman speaks about personalities being injected into this discussion, let me say they first came from the gentleman from North Carolina, whose project this is, because he was the first one who had the temerity to charge men with intellectual dishonesty on this floor because they disagreed with him on his bill. Let me say a word to the gentleman from New York. What does he know about it? Practically not anything. He mistakes the commerce. He does not have it correctly. The commerce in 1914 was a little over 200,000 tons. Last year it was only 148,000 tons, and over half of that was timber and logs.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That was by the Government canal only. That was—oh, I was talking about the commerce.

Mr. FREAR. I object, Mr. Chairman. I have only a little time, and I want to go into this thing. I have given the official commerce figures for this project, and those are the figures in the Engineer's Report that we were entitled to rely upon. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] challenges my judgment of this item. I will say that I used to live on that waterway. The gentleman does not know the waterway. I know it; at least portions of it. Only 148,000 tons of commerce were borne on that waterway last year, and this bill carries over $750,000 for it, with over $600,000 in balances on hand. Think of it! What an absurdity! But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], chairman of the committee, wants the project and he gets it, just as he got the other $250,000 project for North Carolina.

The suggestion is made that a remark made by Gen. Taylor as an afterthought—just a remark in answer to a question—the suggestion is made that Gen. Taylor's remark should set aside the results of the investigation and determination of the engineers, whose official reports are before us. Why, Mr. Chairman, what chance does an Army officer have between us when he gets down with the committee and every member is anxious about his projects, when the chairman of the committee, with the interest that he naturally feels in a project of this kind, is interested? The engineers did not ask for a dollar in their report, neither for the first canal nor for the second, and the committee has added $1,000,000 in these two items.

Now I want to discuss one more item.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FREAR. In a moment, and then I will get through. The suggestion has been made here that these improvements will furnish employment to men. Mr. Chairman, I make this statement—I have made it before; I have asked for investigating committees, and they have not been granted—I make the statement that the Dredgers' Association under a gentlemen's agreement practically controls all the dredging on the coast to-day. Under a gentlemen's agreement they divide up the territory and work. They estimate the cost and then they usually double, adding about 100 per cent. I am satisfied that those are the correct figures, because they come to me from a source that I deem unquestionable. Here is the evidence of how this dredging has jumped: In 1916 Bowers & Co. were charging us for North Landing 5.9 cents a yard. Last year, 1918, at North Landing it had increased to 22 cents, as compared with 5.9 cents, or about 6 cents. At the same place the dredgers have jumped it three times and more in their estimates. Take the Virginia cut, which in 1915 was 14 cents for dredging. In 1918 the Virginia cut is given at 22 cents, an increase of 50 per cent. As I say, when you have that situation the men who run the dredges will get that Government money. It is not the soldiers who want employment who will get it. The dredgers charge 100 per cent over the cost. That is the statement that comes to us.

Now, from the evidence that we have the Treasury is in worse shape than it was when these estimates were first made. We have a $6,000,000,000 revenue bill confronting us. The Army engineers said they did not need any money for either of these projects before and did not want it; and yet Gen. Taylor gets into the record and says one-quarter of a million could be spent for one of these projects and three-quarters of a million for another. I leave that statement speak for itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina how much time I may have?

Mr. SMALL. Three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have received this letter from one of the large fertilizer establishments of Philadelphia:

PHILADELPHIA, December 14, 1918.

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been advised that the United States Shipping Board have advanced freight rates on phosphate rock from Florida eastern ports to Philadelphia and other tidewater ports 90 cents per ton. This seriously affects our fertilizer business and costs to the farmer, since Florida phosphate rock plays an essential part in the fertilizer industry; in fact, the material is indispensable. This cost must necessarily be reflected in the selling price of the manufactured product, and it is unfortunate that this is asked at this time, because it will tend to increase the cost of producing crops, whereas the feeling now seems to be that the cost of living should recede.

The present vessel rate of freight from Florida to Philadelphia is $6.50 per ton, and vessel pays for loading and discharging. The new rate will work out $7 per ton, free loading and discharging, which really amounts to an increase of about $1 per ton.

When we tell you that this new rate is three and one-half times the normal rate before the war, we think you will agree with us that this seems out of proportion for a comparatively short-haul coastwise ocean trip. This new rate becomes effective on December 15, and we earnestly beg your support to our protest, and ask if you will take this up for us and for the fertilizer industry in general, since the entire industry is affected.

Anything that you can do which will help out on this vital matter that affects the cost of food production will be greatly appreciated by us and be of service to the country at large.

Very truly, yours,

BAUGH & SONS CO.,
E. BUTLER, JR.,
Treasurer.

The present vessel rate referred to in this letter is for that outside ocean voyage that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] thinks we should resort to.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In a moment. Both gentlemen from Wisconsin have been arguing for an outside route. One of them said he has seen "a little dory"—that, I am frank to say, might send him to oblivion in some of these inland waters about which he complains—riding gaily out on the ocean "in a tempestuous sea." I have never in my experience, except down in the West Indies, seen any "little dory" riding on "a tempestuous sea" out in the ocean. And I question from what I did see whether the gentleman from Wisconsin would care to be in one under the circumstances. But I read recently of dozens of American vessels going to the bottom on the Atlantic coast in peaceful seas because we did not have these inland waterways open. The German submarines were out there on the open sea and the American ships that might have used an inside passage in times of war, but which had not been prepared for them, were sent to the bottom. It was "too expensive" to build these inside waterways. The gentleman has forgotten that the ocean has not been free, is not free now, to American shipping along the Atlantic seaboard. The gentleman has forgotten that the German submarines were here and that American vessels were sunk and American coastwise shipping stopped because American torpedo-boat destroyers were loaned to our allies to protect their shipping and ours on the other side of the water. The gentleman has temerity to stand here and say that we shall not improve our inland waterways, but shall continue to take all the risks of the outside sea, upon which he once saw a little dory riding in a tempestuous storm.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] have so completely answered any objection to the appropriation for this waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort that I would not consume the time of the committee except for the remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. I have such great respect for him that I am constrained to say he would not have made the argument he did if he had been well informed. It is impossible for a man within 5 minutes or 10 minutes to glance over a report and reach a satisfactory conclusion on a subject upon which boards of engineers have been engaged in investigation for months and upon which at least some members of the committee have read hundreds of pages of evidence and upon which at least some Members of the House have endeavored to give intelligent study. So, while the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was not creditable to him, it is due to the fact that he had not given sufficient time to study the reports and inform himself.

The gentleman talks about the necessity of this interior waterway when we have the Atlantic Ocean. Does the gentleman know that this waterway lies behind Cape Hatteras and Cape Lookout, which, along with Cape Cod, are the most dangerous points along the Atlantic seaboard and in the whole world? Does the gentleman know that this waterway leading down from Norfolk traverses the sounds of eastern North Carolina to Beaufort, and that for that entire distance there is not a single navigable outlet to the ocean, so that the only way those people in eastern North Carolina can reach Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia by water is through this inside route? Does the gentleman know further that prior to this war we were building up quite a substantial through commerce between Charleston and Savannah and other southern ports with Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia? This traffic was by barges, which navigated the ocean south of Beaufort Inlet.

Beaufort Inlet lies south of both Cape Hatteras and Cape Lookout, from which point coastwise navigation south to Jacksonville is comparatively safe. There is not a more meritorious project in all the country than this Norfolk-Beaufort waterway. The gentleman simply did not know. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Blackwater River, Va.; Meherrin and Roanoke Rivers, and Newbegun Creek, N. C.: Completing improvement of Newbegun Creek in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 24, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $5,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire before I conclude these remarks to discuss Newbegun Creek. I am interested, and I think the House ought to be interested, in the unprejudiced judgment passed upon this inland waterway by the president of the Inland Waterways Association, assisted by the vice president of the Inland Waterways Association.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I have only five minutes, and I want to discuss Newbegun Creek.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is so personal——

Mr. FREAR. I will say this, that the gentleman is one of the most courteous and one of the most able gentlemen on the floor of the House; but when this question is raised by these two gentlemen here, of course they have this deep interest in it, it is very dear to their hearts, and they have urged it constantly. I am not speaking now of the vast amount of money in this bill in which the gentleman's community is interested, as well as the large amount going to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], but I do say that they are not entirely unprejudiced, and I do not assume that I am. I try to be, however.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman makes this personal reference on every paragraph of the bill. Surely there must be some reason for it.

Mr. FREAR. No; this last item is an inland waterway, where a million dollars has been put in.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No, I can not; this next item is the Newbegun Creek, a very important proposition. It was stricken out in the 1914 bill. I read from the Engineer's Report:

A gasoline boat 57 feet long, with 4½ feet maximum draft, runs between the landings on this creek and Elizabeth City, making daily round trips during most of the year, though occasionally the schedule is reduced to three round trips per week. This boat makes connection at Elizabeth City with the Norfolk Southern Railroad. There are a number of other boats used on this stream, but they do not appear to run on a regular schedule.

It has not been possible to obtain complete statistics as to the annual commerce of the stream, owing to the partial destruction by fire of the records of the gasoline boat, but from the data that could be obtained it is estimated that the annual commerce amounts to about 5,000 tons, valued at $300,000.

This is the first examination of this creek that has been directed by Congress, and no work has ever been done upon it by the United States, but about 30 years ago an attempt to improve the bar was made by a local steamboat company, which excavated the southern channel now used.

That item is shoved in here when we are paying more taxes and more taxes and more funds are asked with which to buy liberty bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state when this Newbegun Creek was begun?

Mr. FREAR. It does not say when it was begun. Probably just begun. It is a tributary of the Albemarle Sound, but it says that the stream varies in depth after a rainfall, and that with unfavorable wind the variation may be 2 feet.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the wind blow the water out of the channel?

Mr. FREAR. To the extent of 2 feet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will yield for a question but not for a statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has never been upon the water——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does not the gentleman think it would be advisable to investigate the Deep Waterway League, the same as they are investigating the National Security League?

Mr. FREAR. No; because the gentleman was in favor of investigating the National Security League, and he is not in favor of an investigation of the Waterway League. I accept his judgment in this case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that the action of the wind influences the tide?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; it states here to the extent of 2 feet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that the wind frequently holds the water down so that vessels have to wait until the wind subsides?

Mr. FREAR. That is so in the Newbegun Creek to the extent of 2 feet. The gasoline boat can not get up the creek when the wind blows.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there any gentleman except he who comes from the mountain top that would laugh at that proposition?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, we have the second largest harbor in the country in my own State and plenty of good waterway projects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, the gentleman runs like a March hare.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and so does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has interrupted me. I can not yield to discussion further on this line.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman from Wisconsin think of the suggestion that a bulkhead be built on one side of the channel to stop the wind from blowing the water out of the channel?

Mr. FREAR. I think it would be better to place the gasoline boat on stilts, or use some other means for floating it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manteo Bay, Scuppernong, Pamlico, Tar, South, Bay, Neuse, and Trent Rivers, Fishing, Contentnea, Swift, and Smith Creeks, and waterway connecting Swan Quarter Bay with Deep Bay, N. C.: For maintenance, $7,500; completing improvement of Scuppernong River in accordance with the report submitted in House document No. 1196, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $31,800; in all, $39,300.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to express my commendation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in trying to get lower freight rates on phosphate rock. The gentleman has been so uniformly criticizing the southern producer in all things that we grow——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I never unfavorably criticized the southern producer, but always sought to encourage him and have him do his best.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I have heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania stand on the floor and criticize the southern cotton planter for not being patriotic because he would not grow more linters, when the gentleman knows, as a matter of fact, that there is no such thing as the growing of linters. The gentleman has learned that none of these items enters into the cost of production, including that of cotton, because his manufacturers have it brought home to them that the gentleman is willing to do something for the southern cotton planters. I am glad to find him on that side, even if he has been moved by the interests of the northern manufacturer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I see that the gentleman is good-natured about this, and I shall not pursue the controversy. I think we are pretty nearly alike on the proposition.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to the Scuppernong River, if I may; that is, Scuppernong Creek, which is the project, one of the six new projects that go into the bill.

Mr. MANN. What is the meaning of the word "scuppernong?"

Mr. FREAR. Scuppernong is a grape, and a very delicious one. I have lived down there, and I know. In 1913 the commerce of this remarkable creek amounted to 30,000 tons, but in 1917 it had dwindled down to 9,000 tons. You may be sure that the engineer who made the estimates down there, when he gave a loss of 70 per cent, did not misrepresent it. The average haul is 4 miles. No boat lines have been established. The improvement has had the effect of reducing the freight rates, it says. All of the wharves are privately owned. Mr. Chairman, nearly one-half of the speech of the chairman of the committee was in regard to having publicly owned wharves on waterways, and here down in his own State we find that they are privately owned. Why select Ohio for public wharves instead of having the wharves down in North Carolina public? I have before me Document No. 1196 of the Sixty-second Congress, second session, which contains a report way back in 1912, and in this time, when we are taking the blood out of the people, to use the splendid expression of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], to pay bills, you are asking us to put the Scuppernong Creek and Newbegun Creek in this bill. Let us see what the report says. Reading from page 5 we find that the first report was unfavorable to any improvements, because of the small commerce and the sparse population, for they were amply served as it was at that time, and now the commerce has dwindled to 9,000 tons. The report of 1902 covered some proposed improvements at the bar and was a favorable one and resulted in adoption.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they got bars down there?

Mr. FREAR. They have bars there. It is said in the report that the improvements made have resulted in placing the commerce on a substantial basis, excepting for a severe blow that was received in 1908. What was that severe blow? "Prior to that time there were no railroads in that section, and all the transportation of products was dependent upon the water, but during 1908 a branch of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad was extended to Creswell," and that was the unfortunate occurrence which took away from the water traffic. It is said that that, combined with the financial panic of that year, resulted in a large decrease in the river tonnage. The report says that at that time it was 68,000 tons, and now it is only 9,000 tons. Think of it. Here is a loss of about 85 per cent in that time, and this bill proposes to give this creek as much more as it has had in all of the years of the past. Think of the waste in this project! Generally speaking, it is said the depth of water appears to be ample for the one steamer and 25 schooners that navigate the river, except above Cross Landing, and then it is rendered difficult on account of the bends and obstructions. Yet with that statement of facts, with that situation presented by the engineers in the report of 1912, the people of the country in this year, with a deficit of eighteen billions before the country, with people being urged to buy liberty bonds, are to be taxed $1,000,000 for two little waterways down there, together with the Newbegun and the Scuppernong Creeks. Think of the absurdity of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beaufort and Morehead City Harbors, Beaufort Inlet, waterway from Pamlico Sound to Beaufort Inlet, waterway connecting Core Sound and Beaufort Harbor, channel connecting Thoroughfare Bay and Cedar Bay, and inland waterway Beaufort to Jacksonville, N. C.: For maintenance, $24,500; completing improvement of Beaufort Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1108, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $15,900; completing improvement of channel connecting Thoroughfare Bay and Cedar Bay, N. C., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1125, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $5,200; in all, $45,600.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MADDEN. This item has not been passed.

Mr. SMALL. No; it is open for discussion. I desire to announce now that we shall try to complete the bill to-morrow. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the River and Harbor appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if we are to have notice now that we are to stay in session to-morrow night until this bill is passed, I think I shall have to object to meeting at 11 o'clock. I have other things to do.

Mr. SMALL. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to object.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman was present when we had the colloquy here.

Mr. MADDEN. I know I was present.

Mr. SMALL. And when it was announced——

Mr. MADDEN. But there was not any such statement made as that we are going to stay in session until late to-morrow night.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman may not have heard it.

Mr. MADDEN. I was here, and there was no statement of that sort made. Anyhow, if there is such a statement made now, I am going to object. I am willing to meet at 11 o'clock, but I am not willing to stay until 9 o'clock to-morrow night.

The SPEAKER. That is no part of the gentleman's request.

Mr. MADDEN. I know.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but that was not part of the gentleman's request.

Mr. MADDEN. And unless the gentleman says he does not intend to do that——

Mr. SMALL. Of course, the completion of the bill is in the control of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow?

Mr. MADDEN. I think I shall have to object, unless we have an understanding that we quit at a reasonable time to-morrow night.

Mr. SMALL. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

THE LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL. (H. REPT. NO. 910).

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I present a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves all points of order on the bill, and the bill is ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, on December 30 I introduced a bill (H. R. 13565) affecting the mining of rare minerals, which was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which it belongs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think when a gentleman makes a request we should hear what it is. We could not hear what the gentleman was asking, and the Speaker did not state the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it over again so that all gentlemen can hear it.

Mr. WELLING. I ask unanimous consent that a bill I introduced on December 30, which was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and that request has the indorsement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MANN and Mr. ROBBINS. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in reference to the mining of rare minerals.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the mistake was made by marking it "M. & M."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House that on Monday, after the reading of the Journal, I have 20 minutes to speak upon the question of the League to Enforce Peace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] asks unanimous consent that next Monday, after the reading of the Journal, on the conclusion of business on the Speaker's table, that he shall be permitted to address the House for not to exceed 20 minutes on the League to Enforce Peace.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say that I am extremely sorry to have to object to any request made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], but some time ago I gave notice that during the short session, when I was present, objection would be made to making a speech after the reading of the Journal. It would have to come up in general debate on some bill. The reason for it is, of course, that it might interfere with the transaction of important business.

Mr. MANN. We will probably be on the legislative appropriation bill in general debate on Monday. I have no doubt that my colleague could secure time on that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I will renew the request that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. If we can have some assurance that we will adjourn not later than 6 o'clock to-morrow, I will not object. I am as anxious to get through as anybody else is.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we will finish the bill, but I could not give the assurance.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 11, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a proposed draft of a bill providing for readjustment of the rates of pay of chief pay clerks and chief pharmacists of the Navy (H. Doc. No. 1669); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the assistant chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Harry R. Hurlbut, Sherman R. Hurlbut, Elizabeth J. Hurlbut, and Horace A. Hurlbut, heirs of Frederick J. Hurlbut, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1670); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for the fiscal year 1919 (H. 7. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Agriculture for assistance in supplying and conserving farm labor through cooperation with State, county, and local agencies, fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1675); to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture submitting a substitute estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Agriculture for farmers' cooperative demonstration work, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 1676); to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17) to include certain lands in the counties of Modoc and Siskiyou, Cal., in the Modoc National Forest, California, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 909), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. WELLING, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2885) for the relief of Moses M. Bane, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 905), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5495) for the relief of Joseph A. Prat, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 906), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4923) to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 907), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WELLING, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9045) for the relief of certain pay officers of the United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 908), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 11, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for that desire which Thou hast implanted in the heart of man, which is ever moving him upward and onward toward a betterment of his condition, physically, mentally, morally, spiritually; for every honest, patriotic, philanthropic measure in the home, the State, the Nation, looking to that end; and we most fervently pray that it may possess our hearts until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ; and Thine be the praise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 13026, with the report.

The SPEAKER. What is the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to provide a hospital and sanitarium facilities for discharged and sick soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for a reprint of a thousand copies of the bill named, with the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 79. An act for the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain in Minnesota;

H. R. 1423. An act for the relief of Alexander F. McCollam;

H. R. 9865. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands to school district No. 28, of Missoula County, Mont.;

H. R. 8444. An act for the relief of Ira G. Kilpatrick and Guy D. Dill; and

H. R. 12194. An act to provide for the award of medals of honor, distinguished-service medals, and Navy crosses, and for other purposes.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of Members of the House to a matter that seems to me to be of considerable importance and that should receive early consideration. Much has been said about the alleged inefficiency of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. I think there will be less cause for complaint under the management of the newly appointed director, who seems to take hold with a will to accomplish results. However, there is a new branch of work upon which the bureau is only just about to commence. That is the branch concerning compensation for death or disability incurred in the service. I have introduced a bill to have that business transferred from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to the Bureau of Pensions, where it properly belongs and where all the facilities, machinery, and organization for that kind of work already exist. Whether you call it compensation or pensions it amounts precisely to the same thing. The same procedure and the same proofs are necessary as in the establishment of a right to pension under the general law for disability or death incurred in the service. It would take years and cost millions of dollars before the Bureau of War Risk Insurance could be as well organized and as well equipped for the special work required as the Bureau of Pensions is now already organized and equipped. Millions of dollars will be saved if the bill providing for the transfer of this work to the Pension Bureau is speedily passed.

I understand that there are now some 14,000 clerks and employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. Nearly or quite all of them are inexperienced, and I think every Member of Congress has had great difficulty in securing any satisfactory action or information concerning matters in that bureau. The matter of compensation for death or disability incurred in the service and the adjudication of such cases is one peculiarly within the province of the Pension Bureau. Its clerks, examiners, and medical force have had long training and experience in the questions necessarily involved; they have all the machinery and would be fully prepared to give prompt and efficient service in all cases at much less expense and with much less loss of time than would be possible in the War Risk Insurance Bureau. I believe the officials of both bureaus would welcome the change, and that it should be speedily made now when the work under that provision of the war-risk insurance act is just commencing. I ask the most careful consideration of the following statement of reasons for the passage of the bill now pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee:

Since the foundation of the Republic all of the pensions paid to soldiers, seamen, and marines have been paid through the Pension Bureau. All of the archives relating to such claims are on file in the Pension Bureau. This comprehends the War of the Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and the various Indian wars.

Thus not only the pension history of the Government in all its various forms is in the same place but also is found there the individual military and naval history of each claimant for pension. There is a continuous record with relation to such matters in the one place without a break since the beginning of this Government.

The act of October 6, 1917, for the first time in the history of the Government, takes away from the Pension Bureau the consideration of claims based upon military and naval service. It calls the bounty of the Government "compensation" instead of "pension," but the purpose and meaning of both terms are exactly the same.

The employees of the Pension Bureau are peculiarly and effectively schooled in the administration of claims for pension. The building which they occupy is the only one which is distinctly for the use of a bureau. It is arranged conveniently to accommodate that kind of work. The bureau is officered and regulated for the proper and early disposition of claims. It has a field force, the members of which have had years of experience in inquiry into and report upon claims. It has an arrangement for designating and placing the files of the bureau so as to make them readily accessible.

Its various divisions for considering and adjudicating claims, reviewing them, enrolling them, and paying those admitted have had many years of experience, and they work expeditiously and intelligently. They could easily handle the added work incident to claims for compensation.

The adjudication of invalid pension claims involves both the procuring, arranging, and weighing of the evidence necessary to determine the legal title of applicants, and the consideration of anatomical, surgical, and pathological questions, in order to determine whether a ratable degree of disability exists, and to decide upon a legal and equitable rate of pension in case of allowance. This work, especially where a combination of disabilities is alleged, is often complicated and presents many difficult and perplexing problems. The Bureau of Pensions has, in the years which have passed since its establishment, gradually built up a system for handling such claims. During this process much progress has been made in discovering and correcting mistakes of policy and practice, eliminating inconsistencies, and bringing about orderly methods. While it is not contended that the system is perfect, it is believed to be far superior to any which could be developed without years of practical training and experience along these lines.

The Bureau of Pensions has the trained force and the machinery necessary for mailing millions of checks annually with efficiency and dispatch. In its disbursing office and finance division it is supplied with the equipment necessary to make payments of amounts, large or small, in lump sums or at fixed intervals to large numbers of people, and to make adequate administrative examination of the accounts of such payments in accordance with law.

The Bureau of Pensions has a Medical Division with a trained and experienced corps of medical examiners and reviewers, whose duties are to pass on all medical questions as to pathological results and immediate cause of death, and the fixing and adjusting of rates commensurate with the degree of disability shown. This class of work is so vitally important that it is deemed wise and proper to have the concurrent opinion of at least two, and in many cases three, medical men on every case, and this has been for a long time, and is still, the practice of the Medical Division.

The local examining boards situated at convenient places throughout the United States number about 1,300, in addition to which there are about 128 single surgeons and 550 specialists. These physicians are selected by reason of their skill in medicine and surgery, and, after long experience in making examinations and giving exact pen pictures of the condition of claimants for pension, have become very proficient along these lines.

In doubtful pension cases a special investigation in the field becomes necessary to determine the merits of the claim, or whether any criminal features are involved. Examples of such cases are those in which the origin of the disability is obscure, the identity of the claimant is uncertain, or the evidence as to legal widowhood or other essential elements of title is inconclusive, or in which there are indications of fraud. This work is done by the Special Examination Division, which was organized shortly after the Civil War, and has developed a practical system of investigation, maintaining throughout the United States a skillful corps of "special examiners," as the field investigators are designated. This division has an efficient organization and superior facilities for training additional operatives, and is well equipped for the field work which will inevitably arise in connection with claims based on death or disability under article III of the act of October 6, 1917. A carefully selected and capable office force is charged with the administration of the field service, which was never more efficient than now.

The War Risk Bureau is overburdened because of its stupendous task, and it would be greatly relieved to consolidate with the Pension Bureau all the work that relates to compensation.

I have been reliably informed that all the cases where compensation can be claimed for death or disability incurred in the service can be handled expeditiously by the present force in the Pension Bureau, without any material addition to the clerical force, so that if the change can be speedily made before such an organization is built up in the War Risk Insurance Bureau it will result in a saving to the Government of many millions of dollars in addition to greatly expediting the adjudication of the many deserving cases.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the railroad problem.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that next Monday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House, not to exceed 30 minutes, on the railroad problem. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the probabilities are that if we get through with the river and harbor bill to-day Monday will be devoted largely to general debate on the legislative appropriation bill. I take it that it is the intention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to call up the legislative bill when the river and harbor bill is disposed of. Last night my colleague, Mr. MASON, asked for unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on Monday, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] stated that he had announced that if he were on the floor at any time he would not be willing to give unanimous consent at the short session of Congress for addresses to be delivered outside of general debate, and I think it is a very good rule to follow. I hope the gentleman will not make the request under the circumstances.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I have always yielded with due deference to the wishes of the Members of the House, and, of course, if there is any objection I will accept it in the utmost kindness in the interest of expedition of business. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has just informed me that he will yield me time on this bill.

Mr. McCULLOCH rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Reserving the right to object, we wish to proceed with the river and harbor bill to-day, and I wish the gentleman would withhold that request until later.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I think the gentleman would perhaps expedite his bill if he granted the request.

Mr. FOSTER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13440) transferring jurisdiction of Battle Mountain Sanitarium, in South Dakota, to the Medical Department for hospital purposes during the war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13440) transferring jurisdiction and control over the Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers from the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War for use for Army hospital purposes for the period covered by the exigencies growing out of the present war.

Mr. SMALL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GANDY], the gentleman from Alabama spoke to me about this matter and said there would be no objection to it. I will not make any objection to it if the gentleman will agree to withdraw the bill if objection develops.

Mr. DENT. I can not see how there can be any objection to it. It is recommended by the Secretary of War, and the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home desire to make the transfer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman withhold that until Monday?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13462, the river and harbor bill, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13462, the river and harbor bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire what is the status of the proceedings?

The CHAIRMAN. When the House adjourned yesterday the paragraph at the bottom of page 9 had been read.

Mr. FREAR. And I had made a motion to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have had the question raised why I referred to a number of projects instead of taking several and confining my remarks to those. The reason is evident, because many of these projects in my judgment are indefensible at this time, and in response to a statement of the chairman that my position raised the question of honest intellectuality, I am endeavoring to convince the House—I realize that it may be a futile proposition—that some of these projects, whatever your action is, are immaterial. Men have sent word to me that they would like to vote on the proposition with me but that they have something in the bill. It is immaterial to me how my friends vote. Every man votes his own convictions, and I assume that he is honest in his conviction, as I am in mine.

Now, as to Beaufort Harbor, the next one we have, I read from page 3:

4. The district officer is of opinion that the locality is worthy of improvement to the extent outlined above, at a total estimated cost of $53,100, provided a suitable public wharf, with storage facilities and mechanical equipment with rail connections, be provided by local authorities. The division engineer is of opinion that further improvement is not worthy of being undertaken by the General Government at the present time.

5. The board was not convinced of the advisability of the extensive improvement proposed at the expense of the General Government, and interested parties were so informed and given an opportunity of presenting their views.

The division engineer is of the opinion that that improvement is not worthy of being undertaken by the Government at the present time.

This resulted in a hearing before the board on April 21, 1914, which was attended by the Hon. JOHN H. SMALL, Member of Congress, who gave expert testimony to show why that project should be approved and the division engineer overruled. It is recommended for a small amount on page 2.

Taking up Thoroughfare Bay, which is in the same paragraph, and I am trying to deal with these matters, I read on page 5:

This waterway was subject to a previous examination and a report was submitted by Capt. Earl I. Brown, Corps of Engineers, dated May 29, 1909. The previous examination contemplated, in addition to the present channel, a further extension by the way of Long Bay through an old canal to Turnagain Bay, the report thereon being unfavorable to the improvement.

In addition to the information furnished by the district officer the board has had the benefit of statements and arguments submitted at a public hearing held at its office this date, which was attended by Hon. JOHN H. SMALL, Member of Congress, and a delegation of citizens from the locality, all of whom appeared in behalf of the proposed improvement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to these two projects, the gentleman from North Carolina, chairman of the committee, went before the board on these two North Carolina projects that were acted upon unfavorably by under officers, and afterwards the Board of Engineers received Chairman SMALL's expert testimony which he offered in support of it. I want to give him and the House something of information that will be of interest. When Mr. Fitzgerald left the House a distinguished gentleman rose in his place and said. I quote:

I sometimes fear that too many of our colleagues set up as the true measure of service here the amount of money which they can filch out of the Treasury into their districts and States for creeks or rivers or public buildings. Fitzgerald's idea and effort has been to keep the money in the Treasury and not take it out except for the country's needs.

I recommend to the gentlemen to study that speech, because it comes from the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, the Democratic leader, Mr. KITCHIN, and should carry a moral to the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, also from North Carolina, and to every other Member of the House who would "filch" money from the Public Treasury for worthless projects.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northeast, Black, and Cape Fear Rivers, N. C.: For maintenance and continuing improvement of Cape Fear River below Wilmington in accordance with the existing project and in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 746, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, $498,625; continuing improvement of Cape Fear River above Wilmington, $30,000; completing improvement of Northeast River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1356, Sixty-second Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $25,375; in all, $554,000.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 11, after the word "Wilmington" strike out "$30,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$51,000"; and strike out the numerals "$554,000" in line 15, page 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$575,000."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to increase the appropriation for the upper Cape Fear River from $30,000 to $51,000. I have in my hand a letter from the Chief of Engineers recommending the increased appropriation, dated December 30, 1918, after the bill had been reported to the House. Unless some gentleman desires me to read the letter in extenso, I will not do so, but place it in the RECORD.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, December 30, 1918.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: 1. In response to your letter of the 12th instant in regard to the project for Cape Fear River above Wilmington, N. C., I have the honor to say that this project provides for a navigable depth of 8 feet at mean low water from Wilmington to Fayetteville, to be procured by the construction of two locks and dams and the dredging of intermediate shoals. The two locks and dams are practically finished, completing 92 per cent of the project. The work remaining to be done is the dredging of shoals in the pools.

2. The upper lock was opened to navigation in September, 1917. The only boat regularly using the upper section of the river draws about 3½ feet of water, loaded, and makes two round trips per week between Wilmington and Fayetteville. This boat had no trouble until the latter part of October, 1918, when, on account of an unusually dry season, the water was at an unusually low stage and the boat had more or less trouble for a period of two or three weeks, but it is reported that she did not fail to make a trip. Such plant as was available was put upon the work and is still engaged in snagging and dredging. The available depth at present is reported to be 5 feet.

3. There is available for dredging operations $40,000, appropriated by the river and harbor act of July 18, 1918. With this amount and the $30,000 estimated by the Chief of Engineers for appropriation in the pending river and harbor bill, it was expected to keep the dredging plant going until such time as further appropriation should be made at the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress. In view of the expense involved in transferring suitable plant to the upper Cape Fear River from Beaufort, N. C., or other points in the Wilmington district, the district engineer is of the opinion that the full amount of the estimate required for the dredging involved should be available before commencing work, and he, therefore, recommends that the item in the pending bill be increased from $30,000 to $51,000.

4. As stated above, it was the expectation that the amount recommended in the Annual Report for 1918 would be sufficient to continue operations until the passage of another river and harbor bill; but it is believed that it would be to the advantage of the work to have the full amount of the estimated cost available, and the recommendation of the district engineer for increase in the pending bill is therefore concurred in at this time.

Very truly, yours,

W. M. BLACK,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. These are two very large projects inserted again by the gentleman from North Carolina, with the approval of the committee. As I said, he has the largest number of projects of any gentleman on the committee or any gentleman in the House. These two projects carry over a half million dollars. Let me say of the commerce on these two projects, that all of it put together does not amount to one one-hundredth part of one single harbor in my own State which I can name, Superior and Duluth, and I do not think that will be questioned. Yet after spending $7,731,168 for this stream, more than for the Wisconsin harbor, you have asked here for how much? Five hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars, increasing it. I read from page 14 of Document 746:

From a careful reading of the within report and a consideration of the commercial statistics, I am convinced that an increase in depth of the river proper is necessary at the present time. It will be noted that of the tonnage given in the recapitulation of the commercial statistics, 200,000 of the 792,000 tons reported is not affected by the depth of the channel reported on.

That is from the colonel, Corps of Engineers, of the particular district in which it is situated. Reading further from page 21 of the same document I find the following:

There are no publicly owned terminal facilities—

And yet we have heard here much discussion of the Ohio River in respect to terminal facilities, but here is a project right in the gentleman's own State where there are no public facilities—

but it is believed that the privately owned terminals at Wilmington are adequate at the present time for the commerce through the port. At present all of these important wharves are located on the east side of the river, leaving the western bank of the river practically undeveloped, which offers excellent opportunity for the development of public terminals. The wharf owned by the Wilmington Compress & Warehouse Co. is the only wharf on any side open to the public in Wilmington. Their rates for wharfage, handling, and storage are fixed, and equal to all, but controlled solely by themselves.

After spending over $7,730,000 on this stream, $571,000 are now to be added after that statement of the engineer made in the 1918 report.

Taking the next project just above, I read from Gen. Kingman's report, and it will be seen that these engineers are not very enthusiastic. That is, for a project to reach up to three fertilizer factories. The board states that the three fertilizer factories now have a tonnage that would be affected by a more commodious channel, and that such a channel would result in a material saving in the handling of their heavier commodities.

It appears that these concerns would be directly benefited, while the general public would be indirectly benefited by the work.

I want to say, in all fairness, that this is one of the cases in which a contribution is insisted upon from these three fertilizer factories, but they ought to have contributed it all. Reading now from page 14:

If the improvement is worthy of being made at all, it is worthy of being made in the way that I have described. If we spend $50,000 in making a 150-foot channel, it is my prediction that we will spend $50,000 more in the next 10 or 12 years in keeping it open, and we will have an unsatisfactory channel most of the time.

I am not prepared to say that the improvement is worthy of the expenditure of $100,000 at this time, but when the improvement is made it should be as I have described it.

That is Gen. Kingman's report. Instead of following his judgment, the committee put it in and at half the amount, and, as he says, they waste the money; and that is another one of these wasteful projects in the bill, of which there are many I do not intend to refer to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will get me more time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not the gentleman say that $7,000,000 had been expended upon this project?

Mr. FREAR. No; I said that $7,700,000 had been expended upon this river.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman to call it a creek.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no; the gentleman did not understand that. I object to such an interruption as that. Let me say that the loss in commerce on this project was 50 per cent inside of three years. In 1914 it consisted of 167,720 tons of everything—wood, sand, and everything else—and in 1917 it was 77,151 tons. The loss on the lower river reached 40 per cent in the last three years. Fifty per cent from 1910. There is no change in the character of improvement, and yet with that remarkable statement coming from the engineers themselves, you are going to vote to put into this bill $571,000 more for a stream that has had $7,700,000 already spent upon it and a relatively small commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway between Charleston and Winyah Bay, S. C.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 178, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $20,000.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, if the committee so desires, to return to this part of the bill later in the evening, providing we receive a recommendation from the Chief of Engineers, which he has not quite completed, for improvement of the Waccamaw River. If the recommendation is not received, there will be no request to return to it.

Mr. FREAR. For this item?

Mr. SMALL. For the Waccamaw River.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to this particular portion of the bill later in the evening. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway between Beaufort, S. C., and St. Johns River, Fla.: For maintenance, $23,000; completing improvement of Generals Cut, Ga., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 581, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $1,000; completing improvement of Back River, Ga., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1391, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $5,000; in all, $29,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the item just read. This is a canal, as the report of the engineers shows. It is what they call Generals Cut, Ga. It is proposed to build a canal through solid earth for a distance of about 2,000 feet. I claim that this committee has no jurisdiction over canals at all, and the item ought not to be in the bill. It is a new project; never has been provided for before. There is no law upon which to base the legislation, and while the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, generally speaking, assumes jurisdiction over a great many things against which a point of order would not lie, I believe that the point of order is good against the item now under consideration.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the point of order does not lie against the proposition. I assume that the point is directed against the part of the paragraph providing for the improvement of Generals Cut, Ga. In the first place, I may say that this is not exclusively a canal proposition. Reading from the report of the Chief of Engineers:

Generals Cut is a small, straight canal, about 2,000 feet in length, which, in connection with certain small creeks, makes a continuous waterway from Darien across the delta of the Altamaha River.

The district officer states that the depth of the cut is only about 2 feet at mean low water, but that the removal of sunken logs and stumps would increase the depth 3 or 3½ feet.

So that this improvement, instead of being a canal, is a combination of artificial and natural waterways and is an improvement of both with a view of affording better navigation.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, if his contention should prove to be correct, whether the same logic would apply where a natural waterway stops at a point and a hundred miles from that point another natural waterway began, whether, under those circumstances, we could build artificial waterways connecting those two natural waterways?

Mr. SMALL. Well, that is an academic question and has no application here.

Mr. MADDEN. It is the same thing——

Mr. SMALL. No; the conditions are not analogous. I say if where an improved artificial waterway is combined with the improvement of natural waterways, either intermediate or at the extremities of the artificial waterway, that it is within the jurisdiction of this committee and that the point of order would not lie; but in this case Generals Cut is mingled with natural waterways or creeks in order to make up the general waterway under improvement for which the appropriation is made. It is quite evident, Mr. Chairman, that the original jurisdiction of the House Committee on Railways and Canals is frequently used by gentlemen in the House as a buffer against projects to which gentlemen may be opposed and which can not be opposed upon their merits. That has nothing to do with the technical question of the jurisdiction of the Committee of the Whole, I admit, but it is at least applicable to this phase of this question, that the ousting of the jurisdiction of a committee which has taken jurisdiction of the subject should be rigidly construed and that the point of order ought not to be sustained unless it clearly and indubitably appears that this committee is without jurisdiction. Now, the waterway under improvement here, to repeat, and to put it in the light most favorable to the point of order which has been made, is partly artificial and partly natural, and I think the Chair would not only be justified but entirely right in deciding against the point of order made against this improvement where the nature of the improvement as I have described is partly natural and partly artificial.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair ask the gentleman from North Carolina this question. The Chair did not clearly understand the gentleman: Is this an improvement of an existing natural waterway or does this improvement relate to an artificial waterway to be created in the form of a canal?

Mr. SMALL. There is a waterway there already. Presumably, originally, a part of it was artificial; presumably it was an artificial cut, and at present the waterway, to quote again from the language of the Chief of Engineers in his report:

> Generals Cut is a small, straight canal about 2,000 feet in length, which, in connection with certain small creeks, constitutes a useful waterway for small boats from Darien across the delta of the Altamaha River.

It is a further improvement of the waterway already existing, the waterway consisting in part of an artificial and in part of a natural waterway.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there any doubt in the gentleman's mind that water already exists in this waterway, or do the reports show that there is no water in this project? The gentleman from Illinois has stated that this is a cut through solid land.

Mr. SMALL. On the contrary, the waterway does exist at the present time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is an existing waterway which this appropriation proposes to improve?

Mr. SMALL. That is it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So it is not a new canal proposition nor is it a cut through solid land, as the gentleman from Illinois indicated?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is in error as to that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the Chair, if the Chair pleases, to the statement made by the Chief of Engineers, or somebody for the Chief of Engineers:

> This waterway was created by an artificial cut of some 2,000 feet in length, which connected Butlers River with a small creek entering Darien River and is said to have been cut about in 1736 by Gen. Oglethorpe. It is generally a fresh-water stream, but affected by the rise and fall of tide, which at Darien is 6.5 feet.

There can be no question about the fact that this is an artificial waterway and that it was cut through the solid earth; that there was no water except on both ends of it before the improvement was made, and whether the cut was made last week or the last century or the century before, it seems to me makes no difference. If this item is held in order, it will be perfectly appropriate for the River and Harbor Committee to report a bill favoring a cut not only of 2,000 feet but of 2,000 miles, to connect two natural waterways, because the same principle will apply regardless of what the length of the cut may be. Now, we are establishing a very unfortunate precedent if we permit this committee to report and the committee sustains that report in a matter of this sort, because while this particular item is of itself of no great importance and does not cost very much money, it may well turn out to be a very expensive experiment, for if this is sustained as in order what will prevent the next River and Harbor Committee from coming in here and calling attention to this precedent and recommend an expenditure of five or six million dollars or one hundred million dollars, if you please, for the purpose of cutting an artificial channel to connect two natural waterways? I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that the precedent established here is of the greatest danger and ought not to be established.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman from Illinois is clearly wrong in his contention. He stated at the beginning that this was a cut through solid land. In that he seems to have been mistaken. This improvement is to be an improvement of an existing waterway. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] were correct, that the River and Harbor Committee has no jurisdiction over matters of this kind, then when the problem arises as to short cutting a circuitous route or for shortening the bend in a river it would be impossible for this committee to assume jurisdiction, because in order to make that short cut from one section to another section of the same river it would be necessary to cut through solid land. If that were true, then this committee would have no jurisdiction over a river improvement whatever, and yet the purpose of the committee as contemplated in the rules is to deal with the matter of our rivers and harbors.

What does it mean? Here is a river that runs naturally like the letter "S." To navigate that river in the ordinary course would require a vessel to sail 10 miles. A cut across that "S" would mean a saving of 9 miles by a cut of 1 mile. Frequently the Army engineers have recommended such improvements. This committee has brought them to Congress and Congress has improved them. That is a function of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. But this is no such case as that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is very similar.

Mr. MADDEN. The report of the Army engineers says distinctly that this is a cut across a piece of land to connect two natural creeks, running in opposite directions; not a part of the stream to be straightened at all, but a cut running straight across there, say, from here to where the Chairman sits, to connect two streams running in opposite directions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and also the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] if the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is correct?

Mr. SMALL. To what extent?

The CHAIRMAN. As to whether or not this is a canal to connect two streams running in opposite directions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it is correct, it would sustain the argument I have made. Here are two waterways, and the third in between, and the third is an existing waterway not of sufficient depth. The proposition is to improve the intervening waterway itself, the one which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] complains of. If that were improved then you would have a continuous line of waterways. And it is the object and the function of the committee to recommend an improvement of that kind. To say now that this matter should be referred to the Committee on Canals comes very late, because the gentlemen on the Committee on Canals are presumed to have notice that this is a canal, if it is a canal. It is an existing waterway. There is water in it and it flows between two streams, and the problem is to improve it so that the two streams may be made continuous.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to present another fact which is material in the determination of this matter. I repeat my former statement to the effect that this improvement comprises both natural and artificial waterways, a combination of both. And I will send up, if the Chair desires it, the report. Now, in the second place, I want to read further from the report here. The Chief of Engineers says a further survey of this cut does not seem to be necessary, as the only improvement that is deemed necessary to accommodate the limited amount of traffic would be the removal of logs. And I call the attention of the Chairman to this, namely, that the only improvement necessary is the removal of "logs and stumps and trimming of a small amount of overhanging trees."

Now, the report of the district engineer is not controlling. The final report, embodying the conclusion of the Chief of Engineers, is always controlling in these reports submitted. Now, reading from the report of the Chief of Engineers, the last paragraph, it says:

> After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports, I concur with the views of the district officer and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore report that the improvement by the United States of Generals Cut, near Darien, Ga., is deemed advisable to the extent of removing logs, snags, and similar obstructions.

This is no excavation either for further deepening or widening, but simply to remove those obstructions, including the cutting of overhanging trees. So that it is based upon those two propositions, that this is not a proposed improvement of a canal exclusively, but a proposed improvement of a natural as well as an artificial waterway, forming one continuous waterway; and, second, that the improvement only contemplates the removal of snags and overhanging trees.

I would be glad to send this report up to the Chairman if he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes a point of order on that portion of the pending paragraph, beginning on line 24, on page 10 of the bill, and which reads as follows:

completing improvement of Generals Cut, Ga., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 581, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $1,000—on the ground that a portion of it relates to the improvement of a canal.

Now, it is very clear to the Chair that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors does not in this bill have jurisdiction over the improvement of canals. Under section 56, Rule XI, bills reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors are given a privileged status where they relate to the improvement of rivers and harbors. As far as the Chair knows, it has been uniformly held heretofore that under this rule the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no authority or jurisdiction to report an appropriation bill, which shall have a privileged status, for the improvement of any existing canal or to make a canal.

In the view of the Chair, this is simply a question of fact as to whether or not this paragraph relates to the improvement of a canal. It is stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] that this is an existing waterway. But the gentleman from North Carolina also states that it does not exclusively consist of a natural waterway. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has called the attention of the Chair to the report and map submitted by the Chief of Engineers, which show that this is, for a portion of the distance, a canal; and in view of the ruling in the Hennepin Canal case, and the uniform rulings that have been made since that decision was rendered, the Chair does not think that this provision is in order, and therefore sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the adherence of the Chair to the precedents to which he has referred, but this is so obviously a technical decision and the whole question is so obviously technical, as against the merits, that I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair be the judgment of the committee?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to be heard, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, no Member of the House appreciates more than I do the services which have been rendered by the distinguished gentleman who is the present occupant of the chair, and I would be the last person on earth to raise a question controverting his decision if I did not believe the merits and facts warranted it.

Since I have been in this House this question of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Railways and Canals has come forward every time a river and harbor bill has been reached. Each time the question has been raised the Chairman, whoever he may have been, has been compelled to adhere to the precedents, and improvements have stood idle by reason of that fact. The Committee on Railways and Canals has never so exercised its jurisdiction that the product of its work has been seen upon this floor. So that to refer these canal matters, which are of importance to the progress of the country, to the Committee on Railways and Canals has, up to this time, been like referring them to the refrigerating chest for cold storage.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. I want to know if this Committee on Railways and Canals has any privileged status in reporting bills?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It could report bills.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Was not this same question up when a Representative from Mississippi was presiding two years ago?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This same question was up when the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], now a Senator elect, was in the chair. It referred to another project, proposing to connect two existing waterways through an artificial waterway, and because of the technical question raised at that time, that the artificial waterway, on which a great public improvement depended, had not been referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, an effort was made to throw it out of court. Then the appeal from the decision of the Chair was respectfully made, as it is most respectfully made now, and the Committee of the Whole sustained the appeal.

Now, I want to express the belief that it is not in the mind of any Member of the House, and certainly not in the mind of any chairman of the committee who makes these decisions, to halt public improvements, but that is exactly what this technical objection means—to halt public improvements and stop the internal development of the country.

Because some gentleman objects to a river and harbor bill in toto, because some man has a prejudice against river and harbor appropriations, because some editorial writer in Chicago or in Philadelphia or elsewhere terrorizes Members of Congress by writing articles about the "pork barrel," are we always, when we get to the very point of passing public measures which are of value to the community and which tend to encourage business through the United States, to be halted by this technical objection raised at the eleventh hour, when an improvement is in sight?

I rise for the purpose of making this explanation now, in order that the committee may thoroughly understand that there is no desire to personally reflect upon the gentleman who occupies the chair. He has been obliged by precedents to make this decision, but it is our province to cut the red tape which seems to hamstring the House and let these public improvements go through. More money for the United States; more money for development here, and possibly a little less as a gratuity to the people of the earth besides! A little more for the protection and development of our soldier brain and brawn and for the opening up of these new internal improvements in the United States which will give them employment. We have appropriated money to help along the canals and rivers in France, and we may appropriate money for the improvement of rivers in Germany before we get through. We are very liberal in some things, but when it comes to our own country some editorial writer crying "pork" seems to have the power to hold us up. I beg my colleagues on the other side and my Republican friends to sustain this appeal. Let us make practical provision for the employment of our soldiers and sailors when they return to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order, and I demand the right to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia. He will recognize the gentleman from Illinois later.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, if the engineers had not made this recommendation, there would be some reason for voting this proposition down; but we recognize the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] sustained the point of order purely upon technical grounds. The report of the engineers shows that this was an existing waterway from 1736. This canal was partly cut by Gen. Oglethorpe over 100 years ago. That being true, it seems to me the principle of law of immemorial usage would apply that it runneth back to a time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Therefore, we should take it for granted that it is a natural waterway. To say the least, Mr. Chairman, there is merit in the project, and it only involves the small amount of $1,000. That is all this item of the bill carries, and the time already lost in debating the proposition would come to more than the $1,000. Without reflecting on the chairman who made this ruling, I hope this House will vote to overrule his decision.

This project is in my district. I am familiar with this stream. You could not tell that it was a canal. It is overgrown by bushes and brush. If any of it was cut artificially originally, you could not tell it by looking at it now. This appropriation of $1,000 is for the purpose of clearing out this underbrush and cleaning out these logs. The stream is already there. There is water flowing between these two rivers. I hope the House will vote to overrule the decision of the Chair and will let this $1,000 appropriation stand. My colleague calls my attention to the fact that when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was in the chair the House overruled him on a similar proposition. No reflection is intended. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] understands, of course, that he had to make the ruling because there was some precedent for it, and he sustained the point of order on technical grounds. As I have said, there is merit in the proposition, and a meritorious matter of this kind ought to be allowed to stand, notwithstanding the technical objection. I hope the House will vote to overrule the decision of the Chair. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, of course I have no feeling at all in this matter, and all the claptrap of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who has just taken his seat, about his desire to find employment for the returning soldiers has no merit. To begin with, this project involves the expenditure of only $1,000. How many soldiers could be employed on it? Will anybody rise to say? It is not a question of the employment of soldiers; it is a question of principle that is involved. It is not a question of whether this committee has jurisdiction. After all, it is a question of what may follow. Now, what may follow? In this particular case we find ourselves confronted with the fact that this committee is reporting in favor of digging a canal to connect two parallel streams 2,000 feet apart. The canal which they propose to dig is no part of a river. It does not come within the scope of the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that it is a winding river, across which we might make a cut to shorten the navigation. Oh, no. It connects two parallel streams 2,000 feet apart. It is a canal and nothing else. It can not be considered as anything else.

Now, I maintain that the decision of the Chair ought to be sustained, simply because if the Chair decided in any other way than that in which it did decide we would find ourselves confronted with this condition: Suppose, for example, that beyond Lake Michigan in the State of Illinois, which is a natural waterway, we find that two or three hundred miles away is the Illinois River, running south. We will assume that there is no natural waterway connecting the Illinois River and Lake Michigan. If this is permitted to go into the law, would anybody contend that it would not be permissible for us to report a bill to dig a canal at Government expense to connect Lake Michigan with the Illinois River?

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the gentleman think it would be a splendid idea if we cut the red tape and did connect the Great Lakes with the Mississippi?

Mr. MADDEN. I think it would be a good idea for us to connect the Lakes with the Mississippi River; but the State of Illinois, although asking that it be done, stands ready to contribute $20,000,000 of its own money toward the execution of that kind of a project. But here in the State of Georgia, although the amount to be expended is small, no one pretends that the State of Georgia intends to contribute any part of the expense. We are establishing a precedent which, if followed, would permit the Government of the United States, through an act of Congress, to dig the Erie Canal from end to end.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; that is already dug. The State of New York has spent $160,000,000 on that already.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that the Erie Canal is dug, but if it was not dug this would permit the digging of that canal out of funds from the Treasury of the United States. It would permit the digging of any other canal anywhere in the United States without the contribution of a single dollar by the locality to be benefited. I submit, in all fairness, that this goes beyond the realm of our jurisdiction; that the Chair ruled in accordance with justice and decency and good practice, and he ought to be sustained in his ruling, unless you want to establish a precedent that may come back to plague you in the future, and that may cost the Treasury of the United States any number of hundreds of millions of dollars without any possibility of return for the expenditure.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has just addressed the committee, has been referring to the precedents that have been established in such matters, but the gentleman has failed to refer to the last precedent which was established, not by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole but by the committee itself. When the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was presiding two years ago the question of the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal came up for consideration. The point of order was made the same as is here contended for, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors had no jurisdiction in the premises. The Chairman upheld that point of order, an appeal was taken from his decision, and the committee reversed the ruling of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I submit that the action of the committee should be as good to-day when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is presiding as it was when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was reversed. Here is a matter that involves $1,000, and the point of order is made against it. Two years ago a matter involving $3,000,000 was before us, a point of order was made against it, the Chairman sustained the point of order, and the committee overruled the Chairman, and expressed its willingness to pay that amount if it was necessary to get that waterway.

Now, is the Committee of the Whole, only two years afterwards, going to refuse to do for Georgia what it did two years ago for the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal? I appeal to the committee to be fair. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] occupying the chair has made a ruling following the rules of the House. The Constitution provides that we shall operate under the rules made by the House. The House has provided its rules. The gentleman from Tennessee has decided that under the rules of the House a certain item in this bill is not in order. The merits of the item are not properly before the House. This is a lawmaking body. The question before the House is whether it is a law-abiding body, whether it will follow the rules it has established, regardless of the merits of the particular proposition, or whether it will decide it when it comes up according to the individual preferences or lobbying of Members of the House.

I take it that this is a law-abiding body as well as a lawmaking body. If it is a law-abiding body, when it makes rules it will follow the rules it has made, and in this case it must either decide that the gentleman from Tennessee, as Chairman, did not know the rules of the House, did not make a correct ruling under the rules of the House, or else it pays no attention to the rules it made itself, unless, perchance, it desires to have the rules operate in favor of individual projects.

This body can never do well unless it observes the rules of the House. The river and harbor bill always is subject to enough criticism without the criticism being made throughout the country that when the river and harbor bill is up the House pays no attention to the rules made by the House of Representatives, that Members override the rules made for other bills because they desire to interject projects into the bill which the public, erroneously of course, calls the pork-barrel bill.

We can afford in a river and harbor bill to be honest with the bill; we can afford to be honest with ourselves; we can afford to pass a river and harbor bill under the rules of the House, but we can not afford to put in an item in contravention of the rules of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not this body rise superior to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. MANN. I have not mentioned the Committee on Rules; I have mentioned the rules of the House, made by the House itself. The question is, Will the House override its own rules because of some little item in the bill.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. If it was shown that this little improvement was not the improvement of a canal but simply the clearing out of an old cut—and I used to live within a couple of miles of this place—if this is merely the removal of trees and stumps from a cut that has served as a waterway for 200 years, or nearly that, would the gentleman say that we are violating the rules of the House by allowing this little $1,000 to the State of Georgia?

Mr. MANN. It makes no difference whether it is "a little one thousand dollars" or $100,000,000.

Mr. JUUL. May I repeat my question to the gentleman—if this waterway has been in existence for nearly 200 years, water having flowed through it all the time, would the gentleman say that we are digging a canal?

Mr. MANN. That is begging the question. That matter was argued before the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Mr. BYRNS. I did not listen closely to the arguments that were made and I do not know the merits of the proposition, but I prefer to take the judgment of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who tried to make a fair ruling, and, in my judgment, did make a fair ruling, rather than to impassioned utterances of Members of the House who have urged the House to overrule the Chairman regardless of the rules of the House.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I say with no lightness of feeling that I differ, with great deference, with the minority leader of the House. It is with slowness and reluctance that I do so. I want to call the attention of the House to some things which, it seems to me, have a bearing on this question. I think the broad general ground is an important one. I think that the merits of the proposition are more important than the rules under which it is considered. Second, I think that we are all familiar with the fact that the jurisdiction of committees overlaps, and it is not at all clear, but exceedingly doubtful—it is in a nebulous condition—whether this committee had jurisdiction of such a question as that involved here.

The Chairman decides the question upon a certain state of facts and then a gentleman rises who has lived in the vicinity, who is familiar with the facts, who knows them better than any report can state, who knows the situation from personal observation, because he has lived there, and he refutes the very basic thing upon which the ruling is made. He gives us a state of facts which would make the House decide exactly contrary to the ruling of the presiding officer.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. In a moment.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask if the matter in controversy is the Oglethorpe Cut?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; it is the cut which the gentleman referred to.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, we come to another question that I want to call to the attention of the House. I want to recall a scene that was enacted here only two days ago. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that a map was presented here of a canal, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania called attention to the fact that if we made that short 13-mile cut we would afford an inland waterway from the South, from Florida, from Georgia, from all the raw-material States in the South through an inland protected waterway up north to the manufacturing public, and this House rose as one man in applause in response to that suggestion. There was no one voice dared raise the question that that also was a canal project. Why, if you are going to fight out the proposition did you not fight it then? Why did not you fight it with millions of dollars at stake, with a canal 13 miles long, and not reserve the fight where a thousand dollars only is at stake, with a waterway that has been in existence over 100 years?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know that nothing but rowboats are operated on any of the connecting channels, and that not even a rowboat can successfully traverse the proposed canal.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who preceded the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said that the merits of this proposition were not before the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is talking about the merits.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Does the gentleman know that even within my time there was no way for reaching Darien from Brunswick and the Atlantic Ocean except in a rowboat and a ship; that there was not any railway?

Mr. DEMPSEY. When we come to a discussion of the merits, as we will, if the House overrules this technical ruling, I believe that the statements of the last gentleman, propounded as a question, will be refuted, and that this will be shown by those who know to be a worthy project, one which should be included in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not this a fair answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], that whereas we may put canals in this bill providing for steamships, we shall not put waterways in this bill providing for waterways where men are so unfortunate as to own only rowboats?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask a question there?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, I decline to yield any more of my five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is not confined to five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, yes; I am. When we come to a discussion of the merits of this proposition——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. In about one minute, when I finish this sentence. When we come to a discussion of the merits of this proposition, as we will, that matter can be discussed, but the merits of the proposition are not now before us, and we can not discuss them. We are discussing the question whether or not this point of order should be sustained. I point to two things: I point to the nebulous and uncertain boundaries of the rules, illy defining, uncertainly defining, the jurisdiction of committees, and I point, second, to the fact that only two days ago this House as one man rose to the Delaware Canal and said that millions of dollars should be expended upon it, and no one even raised his voice in protest. Yet the gentleman who raises the question now, and, so far as I recollect, every one here now was present at that time and were all aware of the situation, because they are skilled and experienced men. They have been here a long time and are familiar with the rules, and they knew if they could raise the question at all they could raise it then just as well as now.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] is intended to be misleading——

Mr. DEMPSEY. I object, for that is not a question and I ask that it be stricken out. I decline to yield my time and surrender the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I shall withdraw the statement and ask a question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania—oh, I see the gentleman from New York is resuming his seat, and he does not care to answer the question.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am willing to answer questions, but that is a statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I shall take time to make the statement. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] has just made the statement that the item connected with the purchase of the Delaware Canal was subject to a point of order. That was true last year and the point of order was made and it was sustained. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], doing then what he has done now, appealed from the decision of the Chair and the appeal was sustained and legislation was enacted in connection with the item in the last river and harbor appropriation bill. It was not subject to a point of order in the bill as presented to us to-day. So that the statement of the gentleman from New York was very misleading, intentionally or unintentionally, it does not matter which. The question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], who has just taken his seat, "If this House is willing to let go by the project for the purchase of a canal on which steamboats can navigate, why not enact a law that will permit the navigation of rowboats?" was also intended to be misleading. It was intended that the House should be misled and not understand the facts. This item is the only item in the bill thus far reached that is subject to a point of order. The point of order was raised, and the point of order has been sustained, and now an appeal comes from the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Successful in his appeal last year, interested in the river and harbor bill as he is, and as is the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], having a bill made up of pork in which almost every State and district in the United States is interested, of course you can violate the rules of the House and appeal from the decision of the Chair and make a ruling that may cost the Treasury of the United States hundreds of million of dollars in the future.
